Macaulay, Catherine, 1733–1791, the youngest daughter of John Sawbridge, Esq., of Ollantigh (House) in Kent, was married in 1760 to George Macaulay, M.D., and (after his death) in 1778 to Mr. Graham. She pub. a number of political pamphlets, a Treatise on Moral Truth, 1783, 8vo, Letters on Education, 1790, 4to, &c., and the following work, by which she is best known: History of England from the Accession of James II. to that of the Brunswick Line, Lon., 1763–83, 8 vols. 4to, £6. History of England from the Revolution to the Present Time, vol. i., Bath, 1778, 4to, 15*s.*: all that was pub. This is called the Republican History of England; and its partiality has elicited severe animadversions:

"Combining Roman admiration with English faction, she violated truth in her English characters, and exaggerated romance in her Roman."—Disraeli on the Literary Character, ed. Lon., 1840, 387.

"When any doubt is entertained of the character of Charles, Mrs. Macaulay may be referred to; and a charge against him, if it can possibly be made out, will assuredly be found, and supported with all the references that the most animated diligence can supply."—Smyth's Lects. on Mod. Hist. Lect. XVI.

Mr. Hollis, as may be supposed, had a high esteem for Mrs. Macaulay's work:

"Mrs. Macaulay's History is honestly written, and with considerable ability and spirit, and is full of the freest, noblest sentiments of liberty."—Hollis's Memoirs.

Horace Walpole places Mrs. Macaulay far before Hume, and almost on a level with Robertson.

"Strafford's Letters . . . furnished materials to Harris and Macaulay; but the first is little read at present, and the second not at all."—Hallam's Constit. Hist. of Eng., 7th ed., Lon., 1854, 241, n.

"Catherine, though now forgotten by an ungrateful public, made quite as much noise in her day as Thomas [Macaulay] does in ours."—J. WILSON CROKER: Lon. Quar. Rev., lxxxiv. 561.

Macaulay, Rt. Hon. Thomas Babington, M.P., Baron Macaulay, of Rothley, in the county of Leicester, b. 1800, at Rothley Temple, Leicestershire, is a son of the late eminent philanthropist, Zachary Macaulay, who died in 1838, and a grandson of the Rev. John Macaulay, a Presbyterian minister in the Scottish Highlands, descended from the Macaulays of the island of Lewis, the most northern and largest of the Outer Hebrides. The subject of our notice was educated at Trinity College, Cambridge, where he soon distinguished himself by his extraordinary facility in the acquisition of knowledge, and the tenacity of memory which enabled him to recall it at will: in 1819, he gained the Chancellor's Medal for a poem (pub. at the time) entitled Pompeii; in 1821, he gained the same Chancellor's Medal for a poem (pub. at the time) entitled Evening; and in the same year he was, as a reward for his classical proficiency, elected to the Craven Scholarship. In 1822, Mr. Macaulay graduated B.A., and was elected a Fellow of Trinity; and, in 1825, he graduated M.A. On leaving college, the successful student turned his attention to law and politics, and displayed the same zeal in these new fields of research as that which had already given him a memorable name with his fellow-gownsmen. Nor was his application unrewarded with a like measure of success: called to the Bar, at Lincoln's Inn, in February, 1826, he was, about two years later, appointed by the Whig Government a Commissioner of Bankruptcy; in 1830, he became a member of Parliament in the Whig interest, representing the borough of Calne, (acting also as Secretary to the Board of Control for India,) and contributed greatly by his eloquence to the triumph of the Reform Question; in December, 1832, he was returned to the first Reformed Parliament as member for Leeds, and retained his seat until 1834; in 1834, he was sent to India as a member of the Supreme Council of Calcutta, and remained abroad for two years and a half, principally employed in the preparation of a Penal Code of Laws for India, pub. in 1838, but not yet put into execution; in 1839, he became Secretary of War; in 1840, was elected member of Parliament for the city of Edinburgh; in September, 1841, he lost these offices, in consequence of the accession of Sir Robert Peel; in 1846, on the return of the Whigs to office, he was appointed Paymaster-General of the Forces, with a seat in the Cabinet; in 1847, he was an unsuccessful candidate for Parliament, in consequence of the offence which his course on the Maynooth Grant Question had given to his Edinburgh constituents; in 1849, he was elected Lord-Rector of the University of Glasgow, and gained great credit by his Inaugural Address; in the same year he became a Bencher of Lincoln's Inn; in 1850, he was appointed to the honorary office of Professor of Ancient History in the Royal Academy; in 1853, he received the Prussian Order of Merit; in July, 1852, he was, without any effort on his part, re-elected by the voters of Edinburgh one of their representatives in Parliament; and, in Jan. 1856, he resigned his seat, and bade a last adieu to the troubles of political life.

"The experience of the last two years," he remarks, in his farewell address to his constituents, "has convinced me that I cannot reasonably expect to be ever again capable of performing, even in an imperfect manner, those duties which the public has a right to expect from every member of the House of Commons."

In September, 1857, Mr. Macaulay was raised to the peerage, and chose, as his new title, that of Baron Macaulay, of Rothley, in the county of Leicester. Having thus given a rapid summary of Mr. Macaulay's political career, we are prepared to consider him in capacities in which he has gained at least equal distinction,—viz.: as a POET, ESSAYIST, ORATOR, and HISTORIAN.

MACAULAY AS A POET:

We have already noticed two of the most meritorious of Mr. Macaulay's poetical compositions,—viz.: Pompeii and Evening, both of which gained the high distinction of the Chancellor's Medal,—the former in 1819, the latter in 1821. Many of the author's early poems, written about and a little subsequent to this period, were contributed to Knight's Quarterly Magazine, the pages of which were enriched with many other gems from youthful authors, some of whom, like Mr. Macaulay, though not to the same degree, have since attained merited celebrity in the Republic of Letters. Of these first-fruits of our author's poetical genius perhaps the most admired are The Battle of Ivry, The Cavalier's March to London, The Spanish Armada, and A Song of the Huguenots. In 1842, 8vo, Mr. Macaulay gave to the world his Lays of Ancient Rome, consisting of the spirit-stirring narrations of Horatius Cocles, The Battle of the Lake Regillus, the Death of Virginia, and The Prophecy of Capys. Of this work an exquisite ed. was pub. in 1847, fp. 4to, 21*s.* boards; bound by Hayday, 42*s.*; with numerous Illustrations, original and from the antique, drawn on wood by Geo. Scharf, Jr., and engraved by Samuel Williams.

The Illustrations have been engraved, with the greatest accuracy, from designs on the wood, by Mr. Scharf, partly selected from ancient monuments and the compositions of Raphael, Giulio Romano, and Mantegna, and partly original.

The original designs are about thirty in number. For these the most picturesque portions of the text have been selected for illustration,—Mr. Scharf's object having been to embody, to the best of his ability, the vivid pictures of the poet's imagination. The illustrations selected by Mr. Scharf from the antique, and from the Italian masters, consist of Compositions, Coins, and other Monuments, which serve to illustrate and explain the text.

There were also eds. of the Lays of Ancient Rome, pub. in 1848, 8vo; 1853, p. 8vo; 1856, fp. 8vo; 1857, fp. 4to, (Scharf's Illust.;) with Ivry and the Armada, 1857, 16mo.

"Mr. Macaulay's 'Lays of Ancient Rome' differed initially from Mr. Lockhart's Spanish translations in this:—that the latter worked from the native materials, which he refined and improved,—the former simply from the general scope and spirit of ancient legends. Taking it for granted, according to the very probable theory of Niebuhr, that the semi-fabulous traditions of all infant nations must have existed primarily in a metrical form, he retransferred some of the portions of early Roman history back into the shape which might be supposed to have been their original one ere historicised by Livy,—and this with consummate imaginative and artistic ability. He is entirely of the Homer, the Chaucer, and Scott school, his poetry being thoroughly that of action; and sentiment is seldom more than interjectionally introduced,—the utmost fidelity being thus shown to the essential characteristics of that species of composition which he has so triumphantly illustrated.

"The four subjects selected by Mr. Macaulay are those of 'Horatius Cocles,' 'The Battle of the Lake Regillus,' 'Virginia,' and 'The Prophecy of Capys;' and he has clothed them in a drapery of homely grandeur, yet at the same time with a picturesqueness of effect, which carries us back to Homer in his wars of Troy and in his wanderings of Ulysses. Mr. Macaulay has evidently sedulously endeavoured to preserve a thorough distinctive nationality, not only in the materials, natural and historical, but in the very spirit of his different legends; and he has wonderfully succeeded in this delicate, difficult, and laborious task. In vividness of outline, in graphic breadth, and in rapidity of narrative, he approaches the author of 'The Lay' and 'Marmion,'—like the mighty minstrel, unreservedly throwing himself into and identifying himself with his subject. Probably the finest—at least the most poetical—of the four legends is 'The Prophecy of Capys,' which breathes the very spirit of antique simplicity, and is encrusted with such a thick-falling shower of local allusions as to stamp it with the air of truth. 'The Battle of the Bridge' is, beyond the others, full of heroic action and energy; and 'Virginia' is touching, from the very simplicity of its majestic sentiment,—so childlike and yet so noble.

"Mr. Macaulay is another of the few poets who have written too little by far. The fragment of 'The Armada' is like a Torso of Hercules,—redolent of graphic power; and 'The Battle of Ivry,' although scarcely equal to it, is also remarkable for its masculine conception and disdain of petty ornament.

"The following placid descriptive sketch from 'The Battle of the Lake Regillus' contrasts finely with the ancient stirring associations of the scene:

> 'Now on the place of slaughter
> Are cots and sheepfolds seen;—
> [quotation ending with]
> What time the Thirty Cities
> Came forth to war with Rome.'"

—Moir's Sketches of the Poet. Lit. of the Past Half-century, 1851, 297–298.

"The Roman character is highly poetical,—bold, brave, and independent; devoid of art or subtlety, full of faith and hope; devoted to the cause of duty as comprised in the two great points of reverence for the gods and love of country. Shakspeare saw its fitness for the drama; and these 'Lays of Ancient Rome' are, in their way and degree, a further illustration of the truth. Mr. Macaulay might have taken—and, we trust, will yet take—wider ground; but what he has done he has done nobly, and like an antique Roman. . . . It is a great merit of these poems that they are free from ambition and exaggeration. Nothing seems overdone; no tawdry piece of finery disfigures the simplicity of the plan that has been chosen. They seem to have been framed with great artistical skill, with much self-denial and abstinence from any thing incongruous, and with a very successful imitation of the effects intended to be represented. Yet every here and there images of beauty and expressions of feeling are thrown out that are wholly independent of Rome or the Romans, and that appeal to the widest sensibilities of the human heart. In point of homeliness of thought and language there is often a boldness which none but a man conscious of great powers of writing would have ventured to show."—PROF. WILSON: Blackw. Mag., Dec. 1842, 808, 823; and in his Essays, Crit. and Imag., Edin. and Lon., 1857, iii. 396, 418.

See also Wilson's Essays, iv. 419, n.

"His Roman ballads (as we said in an article on their first appearance) exhibit a novel idea worked out with rare felicity. so as to combine the spirit of the ancient minstrels with the regularity of construction and sweetness of versification which modern taste requires."—J. WILSON CROKER: Lon. Quar. Rev., lxxxiv. 549.

"That he was imbued with the very soul of poetry is sufficiently evinced by his 'Battle of the Lake Regillus' and his moving 'Legends of Rome.'"—SIR ARCHIBALD ALISON: Hist. of Europe, 1815–52, chap. v.

"Mr. Macaulay has also written Lays of Ancient Rome, and some ballads, in the same style, upon modern subjects, which are full of animation and energy and have the true trumpet-ring which stirs the soul and kindles the blood."—GEORGE STILLMAN HILLARD.

"The sparkle and glow of his verse always take strong hold upon the sensibility and fancy; and of all writers he is the last who could be accused of tediousness."—Griswold's Poets and Poetry of Eng. in the Nineteenth Cent., 4th ed., Phila., 1854, 345.

"He comprehends the manner of the ancient ballads as thoroughly as he admires their spirit. Their garrulous minuteness, their homely pathos, their close dealings with the plainest realities on the one hand, and, on the other, with the wildest imaginings of credulity, are all represented in his Lays. . . . We cannot leave these Roman lays without begging for a re-issue of Mr. Macaulay's earlier French and English ballads. Wherefore, too, should he not add to the number of the latter,—so well read as he is in history, so well skilled in the art of popular song? why should he not do something more for his own country and his own countrymen?"—Lon. Athen., 1842, 942–945, q. v.

Lord Brougham is so well pleased with the fruits gathered by Mr. Macaulay in his classical excursions that he would fain have him renew his researches:

"The learned and ingenious work of Mr. Macaulay, 'Lays of Ancient Rome,' well deserves to be consulted by the reader of the early Roman history. Mr. M. might render much service by undertaking a Roman history, still a great desideratum."—Polit. Philos., Pt. 2, Lon., 1843, 100, n.

We trust that Mr. Macaulay will remember the hint when he shall have finished the History of England on which he is at present engaged.

MACAULAY AS AN ESSAYIST:

A number of papers of unusual excellence, pub. by Mr. Macaulay in Knight's Quarterly Magazine, preceded the celebrated essay on Milton, which introduced him to the fastidious readers of the Edinburgh Review. This brilliant yet profound disquisition appeared in the number for August, 1825, and at once excited the interest and admiration of the public in no ordinary degree. It was eagerly devoured by readers of all shades of political opinion and all grades of mental culture,—from Sir James Mackintosh, who declared it to be worthy of the Edinburgh's best days, to the ambitious school-boy, who immediately adopted it for his next annual recitation; from the uncompromising Tory, who praised every thing but its republican logic, to the exulting Whig, who found in it for a second time the death-warrant of the first Charles. The paper on Milton was succeeded in the Review by articles from the same able pen, many of them of equal, and some of superior, merit to that famous production. The last essay—that on the Earl of Chatham—appeared in the number for October, 1844,—nearly twenty years from the date of the first of the series. A collective edit. of these reviews—all that had then appeared—was pub. at Philadelphia, by Messrs. Carey & Hart, in 5 vols. 12mo, and also in 1 vol. 8vo. They were eagerly purchased, and within five years 60,000 vols. had left the publishers' shelves. As these vols. were imported into England in large quantities, the author felt it a duty to authorize the owners of the Review to issue an impression for the protection of their own rights; and accordingly, in 1843, an edit. of the Essays, revised by the author, was issued in 3 vols. Though pub. in an expensive form, the demand in Great Britain was so great that within the last few months (we write in 1857) the 8th ed. has been put to press, 3 vols. 8vo, 36*s*. Pocket ed., 3 vols. fp. 8vo, 21*s*. A number of the articles have also been issued separately. The London ed. contains the following articles: (we quote from the issue of 1854, 3 vols. fp. 8vo.) Vol. I.: I. Milton, (August, 1825.) II. Machiavelli, (March, 1827.) III. Hallam's Constitutional History, (Sept. 1828.) IV. Southey's Colloquies on Society, (Jan. 1830.) V. Mr. Robert Montgomery's Poems, (April, 1830.) VI. Southey's edition of the Pilgrim's Progress, (Dec. 1830.) VII. Civil Disabilities of the Jews, (Jan. 1831.) VIII. Moore's Life of Lord Byron, (June, 1831.) IX. Croker's edition of Boswell's Life of Johnson, (Sept. 1831.) X. Lord Nugent's Memorials of Hampden, (Dec. 1831.) XI. Burleigh and his Times, (April, 1832.) XII. War of the Succession in Spain, (Jan. 1833.) XIII. Horace Walpole, (Oct. 1833.) Vol. II.: XIV. William Pitt, Earl of Chatham, (Jan. 1834.) XV. Sir James Mackintosh, (July, 1835.) XVI. Lord Bacon, (July, 1837.) XVII. Sir William Temple, (Oct. 1838.) XVIII. Gladstone on Church and State, (April, 1839.) XIX. Lord Clive, (Jan. 1840.) XX. Von Ranke, (Oct. 1840.) Vol. III.: XXI. Leigh Hunt, (Jan. 1841.) XXII. Lord Holland, (July, 1841.) XXIII. Warren Hastings, (Oct. 1841.) XXIV. Frederic the Great, (April, 1842.) XXV. Madame D'Arblay, (Jan. 1843.) XXVI. Life and Writings of Addison, (July, 1843.) XXVII. The Earl of Chatham, (Oct. 1844.) The Philadelphia ed. (we quote from that of 1849, r. 8vo) contains all the preceding, and the following additional papers: I. On Dryden, (E. R., 1828.) II. History, (E. R., 1828.) III. Dumont's Recollections of Mirabeau, (E. R., 1832.) IV. Cowley and Milton. V. On Mitford's History of Greece. VI. On the Athenian Orators. VII. Barère's Memoirs, (E. R., April, 1844.) VIII. Mill's Essay on Government, (E. R., March, 1829.) IX. Bentham's Defence of Mill, (June, 1829.) X. Utilitarian Theory of Government, (E. R., Oct. 1829.) XI. Charles Churchill. It is denied that this last-named is properly attributed to Mr. Macaulay; nor can we vouch for the authenticity of all the others. The vol. from which this list is taken contains also The Lays of Ancient Rome. An ed. of the Essays was pub. in New York, 1854, 5 vols. 12mo; and in Boston, 1854, 1 vol. 8vo. We have referred to the admiration expressed by Sir James Mackintosh of the paper on Milton: this eminent critic did not scruple, at a later day, to eulogize the author in the most flattering terms:

"The admirable writer whose language has occasioned this illustration, who at an early age has mastered every species of composition, will doubtless hold fast to simplicity, which survives all the fashions of deviation from it, and which a man of a genius so fertile has few temptations to forsake." See Blackw. Mag., xxviii. 587.

Sir Archibald Alison, after a review of the literary characteristics of Lord Jeffrey, Sir James Mackintosh, and Sydney Smith, continues:

"Much as these very eminent men differ from each other, Mr. Macaulay is, perhaps, still more clearly distinguished from either. Both his turn of mind and style of writing are peculiar, and exhibit a combination rarely if ever before witnessed in English, or even in modern, literature. Unlike Lord Jeffrey, he is deeply learned in ancient and modern lore; his mind is richly stored with the poetry and history both of classical and Continental literature. Unlike Mackintosh, he is eminently dramatic and pictorial; he alternately speaks poetry to the soul and pictures to the eye. Unlike Sidney Smith, he has omitted subjects of party contention and passing interest, and grappled with the great questions, the immortal names, which will forever attract the interest and command the attention of man. Milton, Bacon, Machiavelli, first awakened his discriminating and critical taste; Clive, Warren Hastings, Frederick the Great, called forth his dramatic and historic powers. He has treated of the Reformation and the Catholic reaction in his review of Ranke; of the splendid despotism of the Popedom in that of Hildebrand; of the French Revolution in that of Barère. There is no danger of his essays being forgotten, like many of those of Addison; nor of pompous uniformity of style being complained of, as in most of those of Johnson. His learning is prodigious; and perhaps the chief defects of his composition arise from the exuberant riches of the stores from which they are drawn. When warmed in his subject, he is thoroughly in earnest, and his language, in consequence, goes direct to the heart. In many of his writings—and especially the first volume of his history, and his essay on the Reformation—there are reflections, equally just and original, which never were surpassed in the philosophy of history. That he is imbued with the soul of poetry need be told to none who have read his Battle of the Lake Regillus; that he is a great biographer will be disputed by none who are acquainted with the splendid biographies of Clive and Hastings, by much the finest productions of the kind in the English language.

"Macaulay's style, like other original things, has already produced a school of imitators. Its influence may distinctly be traced both in the periodical and daily literature of the day. Its great characteristic is the shortness of the sentences,—which often equals that of Tacitus himself,—and the rapidity with which new and distinct ideas or facts succeed each other in his richly-stored pages. He is the Pope of English prose: he often gives two sentiments or facts in a single line. No preceding writer in prose, in any modern language with which we are acquainted, has carried this art of abbreviation, or rather cramming of ideas, to such a length; and to its felicitous use much of the celebrity which he has acquired is to be ascribed. There is no doubt that it is a most powerful engine for the stirring of the mind, and, when not repeated too often or carried too far, has a surprising effect. Its introduction forms an era in our historical composition. It reminds us of Sallust and Tacitus."—Essays, 1850, iii. 635–637; originally pub. in Blackw. Mag., April, 1849.

See also Alison's Hist. of Europe, 1815–1852, chap. v.; his Essays, 1850, ii. 420, iii. 118.

"[Lord John Russell] praised Macaulay's late articles in the Edinburgh, and agreed with me in lamenting that his great powers should not be concentrated upon one great work, instead of being scattered thus in Sibyls' leaves,—inspired indeed, but still only leaves. I did not express the thought quite in this way; but such was my meaning."—Moore's Diary, June, 1839; Memoirs, &c., Lon., 1856, vii. 258.

"Rogers directed my attention to the passage in his last Edinburgh article, where he describes Warren Hastings's trial and the remarkable assemblage of persons and circumstances which it brought together. Agreed perfectly with R. as to the over-gorgeousness of this part of the article. But the whole produces great effect, and is everywhere the subject of conversation."—Ibid., Dec. 1841; Memoirs, &c., 304–305. See also vol. vi., Pref., xv.

"His critical essays exhibit a wide variety of knowledge, with a great fertility of illustration, and enough of the salt of pleasantry and sarcasm to flavour, and in some degree disguise, a somewhat declamatory and pretentious dogmatism."—J. Wilson Croker: Lon. Quar. Rev., lxxxiv. 549.

"These essays are remarkable for their brilliant rhetorical power, their splendid tone of coloring, and their affluence of illustration. With a wide range of reading, and the most docile and retentive memory, he pours over his theme all the treasures of a richly-stored mind, and sheds light upon it from all quarters. He excels in the delineation of historical characters, and in the art of carrying his reader into a distant period and reproducing the past with the distinctness of the present. He is also an admirable literary critic, though sometimes his praise and censure might be distributed with somewhat more of discrimination and qualification. And the obvious criticism which his writings call forth is founded upon their exuberance of power, and their too uniform splendor of style. The mind would sometimes be refreshed if passages of a calmer, soberer tone were here and there interspersed, on which the highly-wrought powers of attention might repose themselves. Nor does he always resist the temptation to produce effect by a slight touch of caricature."—George Stillman Hillard.

To the last-named gentleman—Mr. Whipple, of Boston—we are indebted for one of the ablest criticisms on Mr. Macaulay's characteristics as an essayist which has been given to the world. The article to which we refer, and of which Mr. Macaulay himself expressed great admiration, was originally pub. in the Boston Miscellany for February, 1843, and has been reprinted in the 1st vol. of Whipple's Essays and Reviews, (Boston, 1852, 2 vols. 12mo.) We must make room for a brief extract:

"If Macaulay thus obtains popularity in quarters where it is generally denied to thinkers and monopolized by the last new novel, he is not the less calculated to win golden opinions from readers of judgment and reflection. Behind the external show and glittering vesture of his thoughts—beneath all his pomp of diction, aptness of illustration, splendor of imagery, and epigrammatic point and glare—a careful eye can easily discern the movement of a powerful and cultivated intellect, as it successively appears in the well-trained logician, the discriminating critic, the comprehensive thinker, the practical and far-sighted statesman, and the student of universal knowledge. Perhaps the extent of Macaulay's range over the field of literature and science, and the boldness of his generalizations, are the most striking qualities he displays. The amount of his knowledge surprises even book-worms, memory-mongers, and other literary cormorants. It comprises all literatures, and all departments of learning and literature. It touches Scarron on one side and Plato on the other. He seems master of every subject of human interest, and of many more subjects which only he can make interesting. He can battle theologians with weapons drawn from antique armories unknown to themselves; sting pedants with his wit, and then overthrow them with a profusion of trivial and recondite learning; oppose statesmen on the practical and theoretical questions of political science; browbeat political economists on their own vantage-ground; be apparently victorious in matters of pure reason in an argument with reasoning-machines; follow historians, step by step, in their most minute researches, and adduce facts and principles which they have overlooked; silence metaphysicians by a glib condensation of all theories of the mind, and convict them of ignorance out of Plato, Aristotle, Locke, or any other philosopher they may happen to deify; and perform the whole with a French lightness and ease of expression which never before was used to convey so much vigor and reach of thought and so large and heavy a load of information."—Pp. 15, 16.

Macaulay as an Orator:

In 1853, Mr. J. S. Redfield, of New York, pub. a collection of Mr. Macaulay's Speeches, in 2 vols. 12mo. In 1853, Mr. H. Vizetelly, of London, pub. Macaulay's Speeches, [nearly one hundred,] Parliamentary and Miscellaneous, in 2 vols. 8vo. These unauthorized issues led to an ed. of his Speeches, pub. by Longman, corrected by the author, 1854, 8vo, and Speeches on Parliamentary Reform in 1831–32, corrected by himself, 1854, 16mo. Mr. Macaulay had not been long in Parliament before he secured a reputation which he ever afterwards maintained,—that of one of the most eloquent and instructive speakers who had ever sat in the English Commons. Sir James Mackintosh writes, as early as March 8, 1831, (Macaulay had taken his seat but a few months before,) "Macaulay and Stanley made two of the finest speeches ever spoken in Parliament." See Mackintosh's Life: Letter to Miss Allen.

"It is hard to say," remarks Sir Archibald Alison, "whether his poetry, his speeches in Parliament, or his more brilliant essays, are the most charming: each has raised him to very great eminence, and would be sufficient to constitute the reputation of any ordinary man. That he was qualified to have taken a very high place in oratory is proved by many of his speeches in the House of Commons,—particularly those on the Reform Bill."—Hist. of England, 1815–1852, chap. v.

"That these Speeches should be equally popular with the Essays or the History of the same great writer was hardly to be expected; that they deserve to be so we have no manner of doubt in the world. . . . For ourselves, we have been equally delighted with the manner and the matter of these speeches. They are wonderful, not merely as compositions, but as specimens of true deliberative eloquence; and equally admirable for the just, and often deep, practical political philosophy with which they are everywhere imbued. . . . If we examine these speeches of Mr. Macaulay, not simply by some abstract canons of ideal perfection in oratorical style, (which scarcely any man has exemplified,) but by a due deference to the variable limits imposed by the variable structure of different minds,—limits within which the conditions of that style may be adequately complied with,—we must again profess our surprise at the degree in which many of these speeches fulfil those conditions. We have no scruple in saying that they will in that respect sustain comparison with any speeches with which the whole range of British oratory has supplied us. . . . Burke often managed to empty the House: Mr. Macaulay, if it be known that he is likely to speak, never fails to fill it. If the benches be empty when he begins, no sooner is it known that he is speaking than numbers flock in and hang on his accents with breathless attention. Certainly, he does not want the testimonies to signal eloquence enumerated by Cicero:—'Coronam multiplicem, judicium erectum, crebras assensiones, multas admirationes.'"—Edin. Rev., c. 490–534, Oct. 1854: review of the ed. of Speeches corrected by himself, Lon., 1854, 8vo.

"The popular voice places Mr. Macaulay in the very first rank of contemporary speakers. Those who are prepared to admit a distinction between the most distinguished and successful of untrained speakers and the confessed orators include him, without hesitation, in the latter class. If they form their judgment merely from reading his speeches as reported in the papers, certainly they have ample ground for presuming that he must be a man of no ordinary eloquence; for he scarcely ever rises but to pour a flood of light upon the subject under discussion, which he handles with a masterly skill that brings out all the available points and sets them off with such a grace of illustration, such a depth and readiness of historical knowledge, as are equalled by no other living orator. . . . When it gets whispered about that Mr. Macaulay is likely to speak on a particular question, the intelligence acts like a talisman on the members. Those who may not take sufficient interest in the current business to be present in the house may be seen hovering in its precincts, in the lobbies, in the library, or at Bellamy's, lest they should be out of the way at the right moment and so lose a great intellectual treat; and it is no sooner known that the cause of all this interest has actually begun to speak than the house becomes, as if by magic, as much crowded as when the leader for the time-being is on his legs."—Fraser's Magazine, xxxiii. 77; Contemporary Orators: The Right Hon. T. B. Macaulay.

Macaulay as a Historian:

Many thousands, doubtless, of the admirers of the impassioned poet, the brilliant essayist, and the eloquent orator, had long shared in the regret of Lord John Russell and Tom Moore (ubi supra) that Macaulay's "great powers should not be concentrated upon one great work, instead of being scattered in Sibyls' leaves."

Great, therefore, was the satisfaction at the announcement recorded by Moore in his Diary, Dec. 1841, two years and a half subsequent to the entry from which we have just quoted

"Macaulay, another of the guests, and I, stayed for some time. He is a most wonderful man; and I rejoice to learn that the world may expect from him a History of England, taken up, I believe, where Hume leaves off."—Moore's Memoirs, &c., Lon., 1856, vii. 304.

Never, perhaps, was a work more anxiously, more impatiently, expected by the public than Macaulay's History of England, from the first announcement of its intended preparation to the day (Dec. 17, 1855) which witnessed the publication of the third and fourth volumes. Mr. Macaulay, however, was too conscientious a historian, and too sensible of the value of his extended literary reputation, to permit himself to be hurried to the press. Truncated Whitelockes, and second-hand authorities, were not permitted to mislead; the ease of the lounger's sofa possessed no charms, and the forbidding piles of the State-Paper Office no terrors, to one to whom criticism was a luxury and labour a necessity. See our Life of David Hume, p. 916 of this Dictionary. At length, in 1849, appeared the first and second volumes of "The History of England, from the accession of King James the Second down to a time which is within the memory of men still living." The success of these vols. was great and immediate:

"We pay Mr. Macaulay no compliment, but only record his good fortune, when we say that these two volumes are the most popular historical work that ever issued from the English press. Within six months this book has run through five editions,—involving an issue of above 18,000 copies; and, on the other side the Atlantic, our enterprising and economical brothers of America have, we hear, reproduced it in forms which appear infinite in number and infinitesimal in price. For the best rewards of authorship he, therefore, has not been doomed, like many illustrious predecessors, to await the slow verdict of his own or the tardy justice of a succeeding generation. Fame has absolutely trodden on his heels. As widely as our language has travelled—super et Garamantas et Indos—these volumes have already spread the reputation and opinions of their author."—Edin. Rev., xc. 249, July, 1849.

The 8th ed. was pub. in 1852, 2 vols. 8vo; and, by Jan. 1856, the sale of vols. i. and ii. had reached nearly 40,000 copies. In the United States, the sale of vols. i. and ii., in five years, (1849–54,) amounted to no less than 125,000 copies; and this number may now (1857) be considerably increased. A new ed. of vols. i.–iv., to be pub. in 7 vols. p. 8vo, has been recently (1857) announced. Mr. Macaulay's volumes had hardly got fairly before the world when they were attacked with much asperity by the Rt. Hon. J. Wilson Croker, in the London Quarterly Review for March, 1849, 549–630. It is said that Mr. Croker's critical perceptions were sharpened in this case by Mr. Macaulay's strictures (Edin. Rev., Sept. 1831) on his edition of Boswell's Life of Johnson, and that he revenged on the historian the offence of the essayist; but on this subject we have no right to express an opinion. In justice to Mr. Macaulay, we could say no less than we have done on this theme; in justice to Mr. Croker, we can say no more. We give some brief extracts from Mr. Croker's critique:

"It may seem too epigrammatic—but it is, in our serious judgment, strictly true—to say that his History seems to be a kind of combination and exaggeration of the peculiarities of all his former efforts. It is as full of political prejudice and partisan advocacy as any of his parliamentary speeches. It makes the facts of English History as fabulous as his Lays do those of Roman tradition; and it is written with as captious, as dogmatical, and as cynical a spirit as the bitterest of his reviews. That upon so serious an undertaking he has lavished uncommon exertion is not to be doubted, nor can any one, during the first reading, escape the entrainement of his picturesque, vivid, and pregnant execution; but we have fairly stated the impression left on ourselves by a more calm and leisurely perusal. . . . Mr. Macaulay's historical narration is poisoned with a rancour more violent than even the passions of the time; and the literary qualities of the work, though in some respects very remarkable, are far from redeeming its substantial defects. There is hardly a page—we speak literally, hardly a page—that does not contain something objectionable either in substance or in colour; and the whole of the brilliant and at first captivating narrative is perceived, on examination, to be impregnated to a really marvellous degree with bad taste, bad feeling, and—we are under the painful necessity of adding—bad faith. . . . Mr. Macaulay's pages, whatever may be their other characteristics, are as copious a repertorium of vituperative eloquence as, we believe, our language can produce, and especially against every thing in which he chooses (whether right or wrong) to recognise the shibboleth of Toryism. . . . We premise that we are about to enter into details, because there is, in fact, little to question or debate about but details. We have already hinted that there is absolutely no new fact of any consequence, and, we think we can safely add, hardly a new view of any historical fact, in the whole book. Whatever there may remain questionable or debatable in the history of the period, we should have to argue with Burnet, Dalrymple, or Mackintosh, and not with Mr. Macaulay. . . . Our first complaint is of a comparatively small and almost mechanical, and yet very real, defect,—the paucity and irregularity of his dates, and the mode in which the few that he does give are overlaid, as it were, by the text. . . . Our second complaint is one of the least important, perhaps, but most prominent, defects of Mr. Macaulay's book,—his style,—not merely the choice and order of words, commonly called style, but the turn of mind which prompts the choice of expressions as well as of topics. . . . We must next notice the way in which Mr. Macaulay refers to and uses his authorities,—no trivial points in the execution of a historical work,—though we shall begin with comparatively small matters. . . . But, we are sorry to say, we have a heavier complaint against Mr. Macaulay. We accuse him of a habitual and really injurious perversion of his authorities. This unfortunate indulgence—in whatever juvenile levity it may have originated, and through whatever steps it may have grown into an unconscious habit—seems to us to pervade the whole work, from Alpha to Omega, from Procopius to Mackintosh. . . . We must here observe that one strong mark of his historical impartiality is to call any thing bigoted, intolerant, shameless, cruel, by the comprehensive title of Tory. . . . We are ready to admit, a hundred times over, Mr. Macaulay's literary powers,—brilliant even under the affectation with which he too frequently disfigures them. He is a great painter, but a suspicious narrator; a grand proficient in the picturesque, but a very poor professor of the historic. These volumes have been, and his future volumes as they appear will be, devoured with the same eagerness that Oliver Twist or Vanity Fair excite, with the same quality of zest, though perhaps with a higher degree of it; but his pages will seldom, we think, receive a second perusal; and the work, we apprehend, will hardly find a permanent place on the historical shelf, nor ever, assuredly,—if continued in the spirit of the first two volumes,—be quoted as authority on any question or point of the History of England."

But this reviewer was himself reviewed in the Edinburgh Quarterly for July, 1849, in the concluding portion of an eulogistic notice of Mr. Macaulay's History:

"Such is this great national work,—as our countrymen have already pronounced it to be. The loud, clear voice of impartial Fame has sounded her award; and it will stand, without appeal, as long as Englishmen regard their past history and love the Constitution of which he tells. From one quarter only—and that a quarter of which we expected, and which perhaps wished for itself, better things—has the melancholy wailing of disappointed jealousy been heard. The public naturally looked with interest for the notice of Mr. Macaulay's History in the Quarterly Review. The notice had not long appeared, when it was observed, with equal wit and truth, that the writer of it, in attempting murder, had committed suicide. We have doubted whether we should add a word in illustration of a judgment in which the public has shown, through almost all its representatives, that it cordially agrees. . . . That a journal of deserved name and reputation should announce of these volumes propositions so openly contradictory as that on the one hand their author has produced no new facts and discovered no new materials, and that on the other he has made the facts of English history 'as fabulous as his Lays do those of Roman tradition,' betrays, it is true, some rankling wound behind. . . . It was a great mistake to assail this work on the score of accuracy. Its author was the last man likely to be caught tripping on that head."—Edin. Rev., xc. 281–282, 290.

Sir Archibald Alison, whilst not hesitating to condemn the historian when he thought condemnation deserved, yet rebukes the too common fault of petty criticism,—exaggeration of the importance of trifling slips of the pen:

"We shall not, in treating of the merits of this very remarkable production, adopt the not-uncommon practice of reviewers on such occasions. We shall not pretend to be better informed on the details of the subject than the author. We shall not set up the reading of a few weeks or months against the study of half a lifetime. . . . We shall leave such minute and Lilliputian criticisms to the minute and Lilliputian minds by whom alone they are ever made. Mr. Macaulay can afford to smile at all reviewers who affect to possess more than his own gigantic stores of information."

Sir Archibald then proceeds to a temperate discussion of several of the points involved in Mr. Macaulay's history, concluding with—

"It is this partial and one-sided exposition of the truth, accompanied by a general exaggerated style of composition, more than positive inaccuracy, that we complain of in Mr. Macaulay. It is this statement of the facts on both sides which, amidst all our admiration of his genius, we often desiderate in his entrancing pages; and nothing but the adoption of it, and taking his seat on the Bench instead of the Bar of History, is required to render his noble work as weighty as it is able, and as influential in forming the opinion of future ages as it unquestionably will be successful in interesting the present."—Blackwood's Mag., April, 1849; and in his Essays, Edin. and Lon., 1850, iii. 628–674.

Particular portions of Mr. Macaulay's History have been criticized by different critics: Wm. Hepworth Dixon and Samuel M. Janney (see pp. 506 and 954 of this Dictionary) have defended the character of William Penn; Hugh Miller and others have espoused the cause of the Scotch; Dr. Lingard (see Lon. Quar. Rev., lxxxix. 289, n.) that of the Roman Catholic Church; and Churchill Babington (see Edin. Rev., xc. 287, n.) contends for a higher status for the clergy of the seventeenth century than Mr. Macaulay will allow them. Other criticisms upon various points discussed in the history have appeared in the columns of the Athenæum, the Times, and other journals of the day.

From the date of the publication of the first and second volumes of Mr. Macaulay's History, the public were anxiously awaiting, month after month, year after year, the appearance of the continuation of this fascinating production; but the tedious term of Jacob's servitude elapsed before the eager expectants were gratified. Dec. 17, 1855, will long be remembered in the annals of Paternoster Row. The publishers had promised the third and fourth volumes of the History on that day; and, as the first edition of the first and second volumes had consisted of 5000 copies only, it was presumed that 25,000 would be amply sufficient to meet the public demand. But this enormous pile of books—weighing no less than fifty-six tons—was exhausted the first day, and eleven thousand disappointed applicants remained unsatisfied, to envy the happy possessors and to insist upon a new impression being immediately put to press. The delighted publishers apologized for the disappointment, and asked for another month's time to fill the unsupplied orders. But this demand, extraordinary as it was, was greatly surpassed in America. One publishing-house in New York sold 73,000 vols. in ten days, (three different styles and prices,) and 25,000 more were immediately issued in Philadelphia. 10,000 copies were stereotyped, printed, and in the hands of the publishers, within fifty working-hours, (more than one hundred compositors being employed on the enterprise;) and editions were pub. in Boston, and probably in other cities of the United States. We presume that the aggregate sale in England and America within the first four weeks from the date of publication considerably exceeded 150,000 copies. On the continent of Europe, editions of the History were pub. in Dutch, (issued by H. C. S. Ery, at the Hague, 4th Part pub. Sept. 1856,) and in Hungarian, trans. by M. Auton Szengery. As regards the division of time in the four volumes of the History, vol. i. closes with an account of the occurrences of the autumn of 1685; in the concluding chapter of vol. ii. we find William and Mary seated on the English throne; vol. iii. comprises the history of events in 1689, '90, and '91; and vol. iv. terminates with the Peace of Ryswick in 1697. It is stated that for vols. i. and ii. Messrs. Longman agreed to allow the author £600 per annum for the privilege of publication for ten years, the copyright remaining the property of Mr. Macaulay, and that the copyright of vols. iii. and iv. was purchased by the same house for £16,000. We do not vouch for the correctness of these figures, but presume that they represent the truth.

Whether Mr. Macaulay will be able to carry his history down to so recent a point as he originally designed—"the memory of men yet living"—is now a matter of some doubt in the public mind; but it is to be remembered that by far the greater part of the historian's task is now accomplished: the history of England from the Peace of Ryswick to the close of the American War presents but few points which require extended examination and minute investigation. We trust that Mr. Macaulay will live to carry his narration down to 1789, the starting-point of Sir Archibald Alison's History. We shall then have an uninterrupted narrative, in the histories of Hume, Macaulay, and Alison, extending over a period of 1907 years, viz.: B.C. 55–A.D. 1852.

We must not conclude without some brief citations of opinions on the merits of volumes iii. and iv. of Mr. Macaulay's History. A lively interest was felt before the appearance of these volumes to see in what manner the historian would treat the great events which brought about the Revolution of 1688, and the measures of almost equal importance which immediately followed the settlement which secured the English throne to William and Mary and their Protestant successors. Whatever may be thought of the political animus of the author, there can be but one question as regards his admirable facility in condensation, his power of graphic portraiture, and the lofty eloquence of his rhetoric. We have heard Mr. Bancroft, the American historian, himself long skilled in state-paper research, express his astonishment at the marvellous manner in which Mr. Macaulay has condensed volumes of matter in the comparatively few passages of which his last two volumes are composed. But to our quotations:

"We conclude, as we commenced, in unfeigned admiration of the power, wisdom, and success of this great national work: of the comprehensive philosophy of its plan, and the rare felicity of its execution. The height at which it aims is ambitious; but Mr. Macaulay has reached it, and will hand down his name to future times indissolubly linked with that free constitution the history of which he has done so much to illustrate. Let those who wish to study the genius of British liberty learn by the light of these volumes, imbibe their spirit, and be roused by their noble fervour to thoughts and deeds worthy of freemen. As long as she is animated by such patriotism and imbued with such principles, we may augur the best for the future of our country, and for the dynasty established by William, under which she has risen to such freedom and such greatness."—Edin. Rev., Jan. 1857.

"Mr. Macaulay's peculiar qualifications for the great task he has undertaken are well known. Probably no man of our days enjoys so wonderful a memory, or possesses such extensive and varied knowledge. In science we do not suppose he is much of a proficient, but over the field of literature his reign is universal. History, especially that of England, has always been his favourite study, and he has devoted to the volumes already published many years of indefatigable toil. Every page bears testimony to a degree of conscientious and minute research which no historian has ever surpassed, and which only Grote, Gibbon, and Hallam, in this country, have ever approached."—North British Rev., May, 1856.

"With the rest of the world we come with our homage to Mr. Macaulay. Steady, strong, and uniform, the stream of his thought continues to flow; and, without effort, or with no outward sign of it, he keeps his place as the first living writer of English prose. There is no occasion for us to quote from Mr. Macaulay, to criticise or to praise him. Our readers long ago have made their own quotations, selected their favourite passages, have read again and again every page of his history; and the universal approbation of the world has at once dispensed with the necessity of panegyric, and made censure impossible, except to those who are ambitious of a foolish singularity. On whatever side we look at this book, whether the style of it or the matter of it, it is alike astonishing. The style is faultlessly luminous; every word is in its right place; every sentence is exquisitely balanced; the current never flags. Homer, according to the Roman poet, may be sometimes languid; Mr. Macaulay is always bright, sparkling, attractive."—Westminster Rev., April, 1856.

Some of Mr. Macaulay's reviewers are far less enthusiastic than the three just quoted:

"Everybody reads—everybody admires—but nobody believes in—Mr. Macaulay. This, which is perhaps the most brilliant of all histories, seems about the least reliable of any. We have not encountered a single courageous individual, among the multitude of its admirers, bold enough to avouch for it; yet no one reads it less eagerly because it is difficult to find any one who has genuine faith in what he reads."—Blackw. Mag., Aug. 1856; and see the number for Sept. 1856.

We quote another comment:

"The Principle upon which Mr. Macaulay wrote his History.

"MR. URBAN:—In reading Macaulay's Essays the other day, I came across a passage in which the author lays down the principles on which, in his opinion, history ought to be written. It may, perhaps, have some interest for your readers, as being, in some sort, a defence to the charges which many reviewers have not scrupled to bring against the historian of James and William, of giving a false colouring to events. Speaking of Machiavelli's History, he says,—

"'The history does not appear to be the fruit of much industry or research. It is unquestionably inaccurate. But it is elegant, lively, and picturesque, beyond any other in the Italian language. The reader, we believe, carries away from it a more vivid and a more faithful impression of the national character and manners than from more correct accounts. The truth is, that the book belongs rather to ancient than to modern literature. It is in the style not of Davila and Clarendon, but of Herodotus and Tacitus. The classical histories may almost be called romances founded in fact. The relation is, no doubt, in all its principal points, strictly true. But the numerous little incidents which heighten the interest, the words, the gestures, the looks, are evidently furnished by the imagination of the author. The fashion of later times is different. A more exact narrative is given by the writer. It may be doubted whether more exact notions may be conveyed to the reader. The best portraits are perhaps those in which there is a slight mixture of caricature; and we are not certain that the best histories are not those in which a little of the exaggeration of fictitious narrative is judiciously employed. Something is lost in accuracy, but much is gained in effect. The fainter lines are neglected, but the great characteristic features are imprinted on the mind forever.'—Essay on Machiavelli, March, 1827, Essays, vol. i. p. 110.

"I remain, sir, yours obediently,

Certainly no one can question our fairness as regards a faithful exhibition of both sides of opinions on this popular writer.

We should not omit to mention that Mr. Macaulay has lately contributed to the 8th ed. of the Encyclopedia Britannica, now (1857) passing through the press, Lives of Dr. Samuel Johnson, of Oliver Goldsmith, of Bishop Atterbury, and of John Bunyan. These have been reprinted in America. Messrs. Appleton, of New York, also pub., in 1857, Biographical and Historical Sketches by T. B. Macaulay, consisting of the four biographical articles just noticed, and eighty-three selections from the History of England.

With a memory so retentive, stores of information so multifarious, and a vocabulary more copious than is generally given to the sons of men, it may well be supposed that the essayist, orator, poet, and historian possesses substantial claims to distinction as a brilliant, instructive, and interesting conversationist. Such, indeed, is the fact. Tom Moore again and again expresses his astonishment at Macaulay's wonderful powers, e. g.:

"Dined at Lansdowne House. . . . Sat between Macaulay and Rogers. Of Macaulay's range of knowledge any thing may be believed, so wonderful is his memory."—Diary, Aug. 2d, 1840: Memoirs, &c., vii. 280.

"Went to Bowood to dinner. . . . Macaulay wonderful: never, perhaps, was there combined so much talent with so marvellous a memory. To attempt to record his conversation, one must be as wonderfully gifted with memory as himself."—Diary, Oct. 21st, 1846: Memoirs, &c., vii. 283.

"Macaulay, another of the guests, and I stayed for some time. He is a most wonderful man."—Diary, Dec. 15th and 16th: Memoirs, &c., vii. 304. (Quoted previously in another connexion.)

"Breakfasted this morning with Milnes, to meet the American Minister, Hallam, Macaulay, &c. &c. Macaulay opened for us quite a new character of his marvellous memory, which astonished us as much as it amused me; and that was his acquaintance with the old Irish slang ballads, such as 'The Night before Larry was Stretched,' &c. &c., many of which he repeated as glibly as I could in my boyhood. He certainly obeys most wonderfully Eloisa's injunction, 'Do all things but forget.'"—Diary, March 18th, 1842: Memoirs, &c., vii. 314–315.

But perhaps no one of these interviews delighted Moore so greatly as the one next to be noticed, the account of which will remind the reader of the literary dinner at Foote's, when Dr. Johnson electrified the eulogizing translator of Demosthenes with the blunt declaration, "That speech I wrote in a garret in Exeter Street." But to Moore's narrative:

"Went (Lord John and I together, in a hackney-coach) to breakfast with Rogers. The party, besides ourselves, Macaulay, Luttrell, and Campbell. Macaulay gave us an account of the Monothelite controversy, as revived at present among some of the fanatics of the day. In the course of conversation Campbell quoted a line, 'Ye diners-out, from whom we guard our spoons,' and, looking over at me, said, significantly, 'You ought to know that line.' I pleaded not guilty. Upon which he said, 'It is a poem that appeared in The Times, which every one attributes to you,' but I again declared that I did not even remember it. Macaulay then broke silence, and said, to our general surprise, 'That is mine.' On which we all expressed a wish to have it recalled to our memories, and he repeated the whole of it. I then remembered having been much struck with it at the time, and said that there was another squib, still better, on the subject of William Bankes's candidateship for Cambridge, which so amused me when it appeared, and showed such power in that style of composition, that I wrote up to Barnes about it, and advised him by all means to secure that hand as an ally. 'That was mine also,' said Macaulay; thus discovering to us a new power, in addition to that varied store of talent which we had already known him to possess. He is certainly one of the most remarkable men of the day."—June 26, 1831: Memoirs, &c., vi. 213–214.

We have ourselves listened with great interest to Mr. Washington Irving's graphic description of the historical arguments (not "wit-combats") between Hallam and Macaulay. Mr. Irving assured us that Macaulay could quote with as much facility from the volume and page of the authorities which he referred to as if they were immediately under his eye.

Among the many honours conferred upon our author, not the least was his election, together with Mr. Prescott, November 30, 1852, to membership of the Royal Irish Academy. These gentlemen were elected to fill the vacancies in the department of polite scholarship (which numbers only fifteen) caused by the death of Moore and Wordsworth.

"Macaulay," observed the secretary on that occasion, "the historian, the critic, the poet, the philosopher,—however individuals may find fault with his history, dissent from his criticism, censure his poems, or dispute his philosophy,—must still be regarded as one of the foremost literary men in the world."

The late Sydney Smith also bears testimony to Macaulay's wide range of knowledge and conversational fluency, and—far higher commendation—to his patriotism and political honesty:

"I always prophesied his greatness, from the first moment I saw him, then a very young and unknown man on the Northern circuit. There are no limits to his knowledge, on small subjects as well as great: he is like a book in breeches.

"Yes; I agree, he is certainly more agreeable since his return from India. His enemies might have said before (though I never did so) that he talked rather too much; but now he has occasional flashes of silence that make his conversation perfectly delightful. But what is far better and more important than all this is, that I believe Macaulay to be incorruptible. You might lay ribbons, stars, garters, wealth, title, before him in vain. He has an honest, genuine love of his country; and the world could not bribe him to neglect her interests."

This work should be perused after reading Butler's Analogy, and with the works of Cuvier and Owen.

"If the generalizations of Butler are wider in their scope, we think it must be admitted that those of McCosh and Dickie are even more exact in point of science, and therefore, in the modern phases of popular infidelity, likely to prove the more cogent and unanswerable."

But Butler is altogether unanswerable.

"McCrie's History of the Reformation in Italy, and History of the Reformation in Spain, have never been superseded, and remain the very best account we possess of the protest made against Romish corruption by the races of the South,—a protest not less ardent, but unhappily less persistent, than that of the phlegmatic North. McCrie belongs to the higher class of writers to whose earnestness, thoroughness, and genuine research we turn for relief from the superficial, second-hand showiness of books written from a transient impulse in order to supply only a transient need."—Westminster Rev., Jan. 1857.

9. Miscellaneous Writings, edited by his son, 1841, 8vo, Dr. MacCrie also pub. some controversial, theological, and political tracts, 1797–1817; contributed the Lives of Wickliffe, Huss, Jerome of Prague, Beza, Rivet, Patrick Hamilton, Francis Lambert, Bugenhagen, Alexander Henderson, and other articles, to the Christian Magazine, 1802–06; and a review of Old Mortality in the first three numbers of the Christian Instructor for 1817. In this review he defended the Covenanters so vigorously against Scott, that the latter was driven to a vindication of his novel which appeared (Tales of my Landlord) in the London Quarterly Review, xvi. 430–480. At the time of his death he was engaged in the preparation of a Life of Calvin, which he left unfinished. An interesting biography of this excellent man and industrious historian was pub. by his son, Thomas MacCrie, D.D., LL.D., Edin., 1840, 8vo. See next article; also Lon. Gent. "We cannot refrain, while we are at all on the subject of natural religion, from recommending the late Dr. Macculloch's three volumes, entitled 'Proofs and Illustrations of the Attributes of God:' they are the ripe fruits of long and earnest study, replete with interesting research and multifarious information."—British Critic.

"The talented writer of this inimitable work is no more; but stupendous is the monument which his genius has erected. Such an exuberance of ability flows through every part of these elaborate volumes, that it is difficult to make a selection for the purpose of a review; for the great extent to which these researches have been carried compels us to be restricted in our remarks, and unwillingly to pass by much which would gratify the general reader."—Ch. of Eng. Quar. Rev.

Dr. MacCulloch was also the author of many papers pub. in the Trans. Geolog. Soc.; Phil. Mag.; Brande's Jour.; Encyc. Brit.; Edin. Rev.; Lon. Quar. Rev.; Westm. Rev.; New Month. Mag.; and Lon. Mag.

MacCulloch, John Ramsay, b. about 1790, in the district of Galloway, Scotland, formerly a writer for The Scotsman, an Edinburgh newspaper, and (for about two years) its nominal (?) editor, has contributed to the Edinburgh Review a number of papers on Political Economy, and given to the world the following valuable publications on subjects of the same nature. Mr. MacCulloch is a member of the Institute of France, and Comptroller of the Stationery Office, and enjoys an extensive reputation as a writer, and a pension of £200 from the Government for his services to the cause of letters. He anticipated the "Manchester School" in his adoption of the principles of Free Trade, and has ever been distinguished for his bold and uncompromising advocacy of what he believes to be the sound doctrines and true interests of his favourite department of practical science. 1. Brit., edited by Macvey Napier. See No. 19 The 2d ed. of The Principles of Political Economy was pub. in 1830, the 3d in 1843, and the 4th in 1849.

"With some of the controversial spirit from which it is difficult to disengage such a work, with some dogmatism now and then on debatable ground, the knowledge condensed in it, the clearness of conception, the vigour and reach of thought, and the earnestness, simplicity, and strength of style, made it [the first edition] a book valuable to its readers, and, what is of the highest consequence, readable with pleasure. . . . We consider it [the second edition] as much the best manual of Political Economy, as the science now stands, that has yet been presented to the world, either in our own or any other language with which we are acquainted."—Edin. Rev., lii. 337–363.

"Mr. MacCulloch has given a luminous summary of the doctrines of Political Economy, together with a succinct, learned, and luminous account of the origin and progress of the science itself, and an answer to some of the most popular objections that have been stated to its utility. The historical sketch is executed with peculiar spirit and originality, and contains, besides many curious notices of germinal truths in the writings of Child, Petty, and Dudley North, the best condensed account of the doctrines of Quesnay and the Economistes, and of all the foreign authors on the science, that is anywhere to be met with. Mr. MacCulloch's view of the defects of the system of Adam Smith, and of the respective merits of Malthus and Ricardo, is equally masterly and candid."—Edin. Rev.

"One work, however, the author does strongly recommend, from long personal experience of its utility,—Mr. MacCulloch's Dictionary of Commerce and Commercial Navigation. It contains an immense quantity of authentic and well-digested information on all subjects of domestic and foreign trade and commerce, on banking, joint-stock companies, exports and imports, book-keeping and accounts, &c. &c. It is, in fact, a mine of practical knowledge for the practical lawyer. . . . In Mr. MacCulloch's Dictionary he will not often be disappointed upon such occasions: Experto crede."—Warren's Law Studies. 2d ed., Lon., 1845, 183, 184.

"The most ample and satisfactory Commercial Directory is Mr. MacCulloch's, which is, indeed, an encyclopædia of statistical, geographical, and commercial information, brought down to the present time. The articles are condensed, and abound in such a variety of useful information that no commercial lawyer can dispense with its aid."—Marvin's Leg. Bibl., Phila., 1847, 489.

"Without exaggeration, one of the most wonderful compilations of the age. The power of continuous labour, the wide inquiry, and the artistical finish, which have been brought into play by this work, are probably unrivalled in the history of literature. . . . Mr. MacCulloch occupies a high place amongst the authors of the day as a hard-headed, original thinker in political economy; a still higher, as one of the most zealous and successful labourers in rendering that science popular; but, of all his publications, his Commercial Dictionary is the one least likely to encounter the rivalry of a work of superior or even equal value."—*Lon. "Such a publication, which can be referred to on the instant for any subject embraced in its pages, is indispensable to all libraries, and must completely supersede every previous attempt to popularize and reduce within convenient limits these various classes of information."—Lon. Month. Chronicle.

"The extent of information this Dictionary affords on the subjects referred to in its title is truly surprising. It cannot fail to prove a vade-mecum to the student, whose inquiries will be guided by its light and satisfied by its clear and frequently elaborated communications. Every public room in which commerce, politics, or literature forms the subject of discussion ought to be furnished with these volumes."—Lon. Globe, Sept. 7, 1842.

"The English language has never been adorned by a more valuable work of this kind than the new and splendid work of McCulloch."—N. York Method. Quar. Rev.

The last edit. has been carefully revised and brought up to the present state of knowledge:

"The present is an improved edition, [1856,] with additional information made necessary by late changes. . . . The articles Australia, Russia, and Turkey, with others of less importance, have been re-written. . . . The present improved edition will be acceptable to all readers of newspapers, who now meet for the first time with the names of numerous places in the East of Europe, especially in those great empires of which in this edition the description has been entirely re-written."—Lon. Economist.

Reviewed in Blackw. Mag., lxiv. 1–16. 16. London in 1850–51, 1851, sq. 17. Treatises and Essays on Subjects connected with Economical Policy, with Biographical Sketches of Quesnay, Adam Smith, and Ricardo, 1853, 8vo. 18. Russia and Turkey, 1854, 16mo. To Mr. MacCulloch we are indebted for (19.) A New ed. of Adam Smith's Inquiry into the Nature and Causes of the Wealth of Nations, with a Life of the Author, an Introductory Discourse, Notes, and Supplemental Dissertations, 1828, 4 vols. 8vo; 1839, 8vo; 1846, 8vo; 1850, 8vo; 1857, 8vo. See MacCulloch's Lit. of Polit. Econ., 1845, 11.

"L'édition classique par excellence."—Blanqui.

"This admirable work [Wealth of Nations] has received the aid of several learned and able commentators, of whom Professor MacCulloch is, beyond all question, the first in this country, and M. de Garnier abroad. The edition of the former is a book of great value, and, like his excellent treatise on Political Economy in the 'Encyclopædia Britannica,' [see No. 2,] ought to be in the hands of every one who would study this science with success."—Lord Brougham's Lives of the Philosophers of the Time of George III., ed. Lon. and Glasg., 1855, 264.

"The student would do well to purchase Mr. McCulloch's Edition of the 'Wealth of Nations.' The 'Supplemental Notes and Dissertations' which are appended to the work contain a systematic and comprehensive account of the main doctrines of the present race of political economists. If carefully and cautiously read, they will be of good service to the student."—Warren's Law Studies, 2d ed., Lon., 1845, 172.

"The present mode is perhaps the best he could have chosen at once to disseminate and make popular his own opinions, and to direct the student in making the most beneficial use of the work of the great founder of the science, and estimating his discoveries at their full value."—Edin. Rev., lxx. 426–445.

"The eulogy of Smith in the introductory discourse is generous and full, warm and positive, his criticisms modest and few. It is such an appreciation as leaves on the reader a strong impression of the value and merits of the work. It is when he comes to details in the body of the work that the editor is impelled to expose the errors of his author."—Stephen Colwell's Prelim. Essay to G. A. Matile's trans. of List's National System of Polit. Econ., Phila., 1856, xxix.

Mr. Colwell has devoted much time and thought to the literature of Political Economy, and his collection of works upon subjects connected with this department of letters is perhaps unrivalled.

20. Ricardo's Published Works, with a Biographical Sketch and an Index, 1846, 8vo.

To these should be added Hist. of England during the Thirty Years' Peace, 1816–46, by [Charles Knight and] Harriet Martineau, 2 vols. imp. 8vo. In all, 11 vols. imp. 8vo, containing 8149 pages, or 16,298 columns. This magnificent publication has been already noticed by us at length on preceding pages: see ANDREWS, J. PETIT, No. 3; CRAIK, J. LILLIE; HENRY, ROBERT, D.D.: KNIGHT, CHARLES. The possession of all the histories of England in existence, from the ancient Chronicles of Geoffrey of Monmouth to the as yet unfinished version of Lord Macaulay inclusive, will not compensate for the absence of the Pictorial History; and it is absurd to pretend to study the English annals without having recourse to the latter. 6. MacFarlane, Robert, 1734–1804, a native of Scotland, educated at the University of Edinburgh, edited the (London) Morning Chronicle, and the Morning Packet, and pub. several works, among which were: 1. Temora, in Latin; from the Poems of Ossian, 1769, 4to. 2. English and Gaelic Vocabulary, Edin., 1795, 4to. 3. The Poems of Ossian, in Gaelic, with a literal trans. into Latin; with a Dissert. on their Authenticity by Sir J. Sinclair, and a trans. from the Italian of the Abbe Cesarette's Dissert. on the Controversy respecting Ossian, with Notes by J. McArthur, 1807, 3 vols. 8vo; Posth. Pub. by the Highland Society. MacFarlane was engaged in an essay upon the authenticity of the Poems of Ossian at the time of his death. His name is generally connected with The History of the Reign of George III., 1760–96, Lon., 1770–82–94–96, 4 vols. 8vo. Of this he wrote only vols. i. and iv.; and vol. i. was afterwards so altered that he disowned it. Mr. Green does not speak of it in the highest possible terms:

"A strange amalgam of vulgarity, impudence, and scurrility, compounded into a specious and shewy mass by a morbid vigour of intellect, which rather scares from its ferocity than impresses with admiration by its force. Though ostentatiously the advocate of the present ministry, the author ill disguises strong traits of the unprincipled and dangerous political desperado. Who can he be?" —Diary of a Lover of Lit., Feb. 24, 1798, Ipswich, 1810, 4to, 65.

MacGavin, William, 1773–1832, a native of Ayrshire, Scotland, engaged in the West India business in Glasgow, pub. a number of religious tracts and pamphlets, edited a new edit. of John Howie's Scots Worthies and of John Knox's History of the Reformation, aided in some other literary labours, and pub. a series of papers (1818–22) called The Protestant. These were collected in 4 vols. 8vo, and seven edits. sold in the first ten years. An ed. was pub. in 1825, 4 vols. 8vo; another in 1839, 4 vols. 8vo; another in 1846, r. 8vo; and another, with addits., at Hartford, Conn. in 1833, 2 vols. 8vo.

"The Protestant, a series of periodical papers composed by Mr. McGavin of Glasgow, contains the fullest delineation of the Popish system, and the most powerful confutation of its principles, in a popular style, that we have seen. Whoever wishes to see Popery drawn to the life in its hideous wickedness and deformity will find abundant satisfaction in the pages of that writer."—Robert Hall's Review of Birt's Popery.

"Mr. McGavin dissects Romanism with a facility which really astonishes, and with an effect which always entertains and exposes the system of demoralization in all its errors and deformity, till it becomes the object of derision, loathsomeness, or disgust."—SAMUEL EDGAR.

"I have much pleasure in calling attention to a collection of periodical papers entitled 'The Protestant.' Both its documentary evidence, and its original argumentation against the Church of Rome, appear to me strong and conclusive in establishing the anti-scriptural and anti-social doctrines of that destructive system, which is not more opposed to true religion than it is to civil liberty." —HUGH MACNEILE, of Liverpool.

"Much information is contained in these Essays, but without order."—Bickersteth's C. S.

"It contains more clear, sound reasoning, and more valuable documentary proof, on the subject of the popish controversy, than ever was contained in the same compass of the English language." —Speech of the Rev. Mr. MacGhee at the Glasgow Protestant Meeting, 1836.

May the benevolent wish of its author be accomplished, in its becoming instrumental in confirming the faith and elevating the views especially of our young men, in whose intellectual and moral character may be bound up the destinies of our country through successive ages."—WILLIAM B. SPRAGUE, D.D.: N. Amer. Rev., xxxvi., 345–358, April, 1833.

Writing at the distance of about a quarter of a century from the date of the article just quoted, we are happy to attest that the "benevolent wishes" of the author and his reviewer have been most abundantly gratified. We ourselves have heard, within the last few years, from the author of these Lectures, a grateful acknowledgment of many instances in which individuals had tendered their thanks to him as the instrument of their happy escape from the sophistries and absurdities of infidelity. Christians should consider it their solemn duty to give such works a wide circulation, especially among the skeptical of their own acquaintance. But this is a subject already noticed in our life of DODDRIDGE, PHILIP, p. 510 of this Dictionary. See also Princeton Review, v. 76. 2. Oxford Divinity compared with that of the Roman and Anglican Churches, with a Special View of the Doctrine of Justification by Faith, Phila., 1841, 8vo; Lon., 1841, 8vo. Recommended by the Edinburgh Review (lxxvii. 562, April, 1843) as one of the best "confutations of the tenets of the Oxford School." See this article,—Puseyism, or the Oxford Tractarian School,—which contains notices of several works on this theme, once so fruitful in controversy. Mr. Bickersteth calls G. S. Faber's Primitive Doctrine of Justification, and Bishop MacIlvaine's work, "able answers to Mr. Newman's Lectures." (Christian Student, 4th ed., 1844, 460.) 3. "This volume of sermons by the Protestant Bishop of Ohio is a favourable specimen of Episcopal pulpit-oratory among the Americans. The subjects are practical; the treatment is plain and searching; the style close, at times almost weighty."—Lon. Spectator; and in Bost. Liv. Age, xlv. 448, May 19, 1855.

Also highly commended by the Christian Intelligencer, Evangelist, New York Observer, Presbyterian, &c. The bishop has also pub. many separate serms. and charges; compiled Select Family and Parish Serms., [chiefly from English divines,] Columbus, Ohio, 1839, 2 vols. 8vo; edited Memoir of the Rev. Henry W. Fox, and Memoir of the Rev. Charles Simeon, both pub. in New York; and contributed articles to the New York (Quarterly) Review, the Episcopal (Monthly) Observer, the London (Monthly) Christian Observer, the Protestant Churchman, (New York,) the Episcopal Recorder, (Phila.,) and the Western Episcopalian, (Gambier, Ohio.)

"He is distinguished for the soundness and clearness of his evangelical views, and for the expository character of his preaching. That for which as a preacher he is most eminent is his power of illustrating Scripture by Scripture. And his mode of doing this shows at once the fullness and the accuracy of his knowledge of Scripture, and the transparent simplicity of his conception. . . . In all his preaching he aims to lay broad and deep the foundations of Christian character, in strong, clear views of man's sinfulness and need, and Christ's fullness and freeness as a Saviour."—Fish's Pulpit Eloquence of the Nineteenth Century, N. York, 1857, 442, q. v. for a notice of this excellent prelate, and a serm. of his on the Resurrection of Christ.

MacIntosh, Maria J., b. 1803, at Sunbury, Liberty county, Georgia, is a daughter of Major Lachlan MacIntosh, and a descendant of the celebrated Brigadier-General William MacIntosh, who led the Highland troops in the rising of 1715. The military reputation of the clan MacIntosh commences with the earliest records of Scottish history; and seven descendants of this ancient house bore commissions in the American Revolutionary army. Of the history of the family since its settlement in the New World a brief summary will be found in Hart's Female Prose Writers of America, and in Duyckincks' Cyc. of Amer. Lit. Miss MacIntosh is the author of a number of tales, which have been received with great favour both in Europe and America. 1. Blind Alice, N. York, 1842. 2. Jessie Graham. 3. Florence Arnott. 4. Grace and Clara. 5. Ellen Leslie, 1843. These five tales were pub. collectively, in 1 vol. 12mo, in 1847, (new ed., 1849, 12mo,) under the title of Aunt Kitty's Tales. 6. In 1855 appeared a collective ed. of several of Miss MacIntosh's tales, under the title of Miss MacIntosh's Juvenile Library, in 7 vols. 18mo, (New York;) Contents: I. Grace and Clara; II. Ellen Leslie; III. Florence Arnott; IV. Emily Herbert; V. Rose and Lillie Stanhope; VI. Jessie Graham; VII. Blind Alice.

This accomplished lady has also contributed many tales, as yet uncollected, to Graham's, Peterson's, and the Knickerbocker Magazines. An intelligent critic, after a warm commendation of Miss MacIntosh's anxious desire to benefit her reader's heart rather than to merely gratify his taste and charm his imagination, concludes with—

"And thus will it be with the author that lives in the hearts and not in the fancy of her readers. And, long after she is returned to the great library of the unforgotten dead, a blessing wide as her language and fervent as devotion will descend on the delineator of those lofty principles that showed the nobleness of simplicity and the holiness of truth."—PROF. Mackay, Alexander, an eminent member of the London press, connected with the Morning Chronicle, who visited the United States in 1846 for the purpose of reporting the debates at Washington in relation to the Oregon question. On his return to England, he wrote The Western World, &c., a very able work on the people and institutions of the United States, distinguished for elegance of diction, vigour of style, and liberality of sentiment. Mr. Mackay was subsequently appointed by the merchants of Manchester as a commissioner to proceed to India to investigate the capabilities of that region for a greatly-increased cultivation of cotton. The subject of this notice faithfully discharged the important duties of his mission, but died on his voyage home. Alexander Mackay was a native of Scotland, and about thirty-eight years of age at the time of his death.

Mackay, Charles, LL.D., a popular poet, journalist, and miscellaneous writer, the descendant of an ancient Scottish house of considerable distinction, was born at Perth in 1812, but educated in London, to which city he was removed in infancy. During the course of a European tour the ardent votary of knowledge pursued his studies at Brussels and at Aix-la-Chapelle. From 1834 to '43 he was connected with the literary staff of the Morning Chronicle, from 1844 to '47 edited the Glasgow Courier, (contributing also to Chambers's Journal and the London Daily News,) and for a number of years wrote the leading articles for the London Illustrated News, of which he has been for some time past chief-editor. To the last-named journal he occasionally contributes a song, with original music. His publications are as follows: 1. Songs and Poems, Lon., 1834, 12mo. 2. The History of London, the Progress of its Institutions, the Manners and Customs of its People, 1837, 12mo. 3. The Thames and its Tributaries, 1840, 2 vols. 8vo.

Egeria, or The Spirit of Nature, and other Poems, 1850, 12mo.

"We delight to observe the march of progress in an author; and in Dr. Mackay, as I have just remarked, this is very apparent; for 'Egeria,' his last, is by far his best, poem, whether we regard felicity of conception, or imaginative and artistic power,—many of its passages, viewed in the light of didactic verse, being of high and rare merit both as to manner and matter."—*Moir's Sketches of the Poet. "Dr. Charles Mackay has been voiceless for some years. Echoes of his old music are still common in the streets, where youngsters delight to warble and in merry meeting-places, where folks are fond of anticipating

'The good time coming;'

but the lyrist has been chary of his stirring lines. He has now seized the lyre once again, and proved that the strings have lost none of the fine old tone."—Lon. Athen., 1856, 130, q. v.

See also Irish Quar. Rev., June, 1856. 21. The Song of the Brave, 1856, 12mo. 22. Ballads and Lyric Poems, 1856, 12mo. 23. Under Green Leaves, 1857, 12mo. This is a collection of lyrics. Dr. Mackay has also written one hundred songs for the ancient popular melodies of England, in connexion with the late Henry R. Bishop, and —himself a composer of music—has published twenty five songs with his own melodies. Of one of these—John Brown—over 20,000 copies have been sold.

In October, 1857, Dr. Mackay visited the United States, and is at the present moment (November, 1857) delivering lectures in Boston upon a theme which few have so well illustrated by their own genius,—Songs, National, Historical, and Popular. Interesting biographical and critical notices of this popular writer will be found in the European Times, Oct. 2, 1857, &c. One of these sketches is from the pen of the late Angus Reach. The author of the article of October 2 awards to Dr. Mackay the high praise that "In his songs, as in all his writings, he has one great purpose at heart, from which he never deviates for a moment,—the promotion of human virtue and human happiness. Free government, equal laws, liberal institutions, an enlightened spirit in the ruling powers, the diffusion among all classes of the best feelings and charities of social and domestic life,—these are the objects which he pursues in every line of his writings. In this respect it may be said that he stands alone: at least, we know of no other of whom the same thing can be said to an equal extent. . . . His verse is exceedingly sweet, flowing, and melodious; and his skill in the musical art has given him a command over the resources of rhythm which few English song-writers possess. In his happiest effusions he has combined the force of Burns with the elegance and polish of Moore."

"If any gentle-hearted, imaginative person would have the springs of childhood's purest feelings touched, and the aspirations of manhood's noblest moods strengthened, let him read the sweet poems of Charles Mackay. If any strong-souled reformer, battling with evil times and selfish men, would feed the fountains of his faith and charity and brighten the visions of his choicest hours, let him read the glorious poems of Charles Mackay. His writings are not the poetry of tragedy, of metaphysics, or of tradition; but of happiness, of beauty and hope, of nature and truth, of man and reform. It is pre-eminently the poetry of the times, singing—in native music, whose thrilling appeals stir the blood like a trumpet's blasts, and whose tender suggestiveness melts the eyes like an æolian's melancholy—the best characteristics, the wisest lessons, and the chief duties of the present age."—Christian Examiner, (Boston:) Vide No. 15 supra.

He pub. seven single Sermons, 1793–1801, some papers in the Transac. Amer. Acad., and an Inaugural Address, (with Mr. Jenks's Eulogy,) 1802.

MacKeen, Joseph, LL.D., 1792–1856, a native of Vermont, came to the city of New York in 1818, was engaged for many years in the profession of teaching, and from 1848 until 1854 was actively occupied in the performance of the duties of Superintendent of City Schools. In 1854, Mr. S. S. Randall was appointed City Superintendent, and Mr. MacKeen and Mr. Seton were chosen his assistants. Mr. MacKeen edited for a year or two the Journal of Education, and as Superintendent of the City Schools wrote a number of valuable Annual Reports, the suggestions contained in which have greatly furthered the cause of public education in the State of New York.

MacKeever, Harriet B. Twilight Musings, and other Poems, Phila., 1857, 12mo, with a Preface by the Rev. William Bacon Stevens, D.D., of Philadelphia, who commends these poems highly.

MacKellar, Thomas, the son of an officer in the British navy who emigrated to New York, (where he resided until his death) was born in that city, Aug. 12, 1812, became a printer in 1826, removed to Philadelphia in 1833, and has been for many years a partner in the extensive type and stereotype foundry of L. Johnson & Co.

Mr. MacKellar had acquired considerable reputation by his poetical contributions to periodicals before he ventured to launch a whole volume upon the uncertain ocean of literary criticism; but the success of his first enterprise encouraged others, and at the present date he is favourably known to the public as the author of three volumes of poetry,—viz.: 1. Droppings from the Heart; or, Occasional Poems, Phila., 1844, 18mo, pp. 144.

"He is a man of genius, with a heart as tender as a woman's. ... I do not know that in my life I ever saw a more complete picture than this book of a heart overrunning with tenderness. His lines to his 'Sleeping Wife' are as beautiful as any thing of Barry Cornwall's. The piece called the 'Heart-Longings,' too, is finely expressed. . . . For family reading, among people of pure tastes, the 'Droppings of the Heart' is the best-adapted book of poetry I have lately seen."—N. P. Willis: N. York Mirror.

"We observe, with especial pleasure, that the great merit of never straining after effect is one of the most prominent characteristics of Mr. MacKellar's verse. He writes from the impulse of poetical emotions rather than from the less ennobling incitements of merely literary ambition."—Knickerbocker, Aug. 1844.

"There are poems of much sweetness and pathos in this collection. Their spirit is tender and profoundly religious, and the expression simple and natural."—W. C. Bryant: N. York Evening Post.

"We hesitate not to pronounce him a true poet."—J. W. Alexander, D.D.: Princeton Whig, Feb. 2, 1844.

2. Tam's Fortnight Ramble, and other Poems, 1847, 12mo, pp. 216.

"Tam—or Mr. MacKellar, to speak of him by his real name—is no petty trifler in verse, but an earnest man, writing on earnest subjects and striving to do good as well as to amuse. Such should ever be the high aim of poetry."—Joseph C. Neal: Neal's Gazette.

"The head and the heart of this author (although he is too modest to make high claims for either) in truth require no gratuitous commendation. His muse has indeed the truth, and depth, and insight of poetry, lacking only the passionateness, fire, and rapture with which its sometimes grandeur, oftener giddiness, intoxicates the fancy. It is a gentle, loving, hopeful, healthy heartiness that is the charm of his poems. The rhythm is smooth, the versification accurate, and the sentiment always beautiful. Extracts made anywhere at random from this book would show how just the character we ascribe to the writer, and how tame the praise we have given to his poetry."—De. Elder.

3. Lines for the Gentle and Loving, 1853, 18mo, pp. 144.

The reader will observe that we have quoted a number of highly commendatory notices of Mr. MacKellar's poetry; but those which we have inserted bear but a small proportion to those which we have omitted. A writer who has received so cordial a reception from the public need have no hesitation in repeating the experiment, whenever the cessation of the cares of business will allow the indulgence of poetical reveries, literary rambles, and temporary oblivion of types, proofs, and compositors.

MacKenney, Col. Thomas L., an enterprising traveller who resided for a long time with the Indian tribes in North America, is best known to the literary world by his share in a work already noticed on a preceding page,—viz.: History of the Indian Tribes, &c.: see Hall, Judge James, No. 10. Colonel MacKenney has given to the world: 1. Sketches of a Tour to the Lakes, of the Character and Customs of the Chippeway Indians, and of Incidents connected with the Treaty of Fond du Lac. By Thomas L. MacKenney, of the Indian Department, and Joint-Commissioner with His Excellency Governor Cass in negotiating the Treaty, Balt., 1827, 8vo. Reviewed in N. Amer. Rev., xxv. 334–352. 2. Memoirs, Official and Personal; with Sketches of Travels among the Northern and Southern Indians, N. York, 1846, 2 vols. in 1, 8vo. Col. MacKenney was, in 1816, appointed by President Madison Superintendent of the United States Trade with the Indian Tribes; and in 1824 he was nominated to preside over a Bureau of Indian Affairs, then for the first time organized in connexion with the Department of War. His memoirs must not be neglected by the student of American history.

"This very interesting work contains the second successful attempt to penetrate by land to the Frozen Ocean of North America."—Pinkerton's Voyages and Travels.

"Though this large volume will convey but little important information to the geographer, the naturalist, or the statesman, it will probably be perused with very general interest and satisfaction. . . His narrative, if sometimes minute and fatiguing, is uniformly distinct and consistent: his observations, though not numerous, are sagacious and unassuming; and the whole work bears an impression of correctness and veracity that leaves no unpleasant feeling of doubt or suspicion in the mind of the reader"—Lord Jeffrey: *Edin. Mackenzie, Alexander Slidell, 1803–1848, a native of the city of New York, the son of Mr. John Slidell by his wife, Margery Mackenzie, entered the United States navy January 1, 1815, was made lieutenant in 1825, and commander in 1841. In 1837, he was permitted, by an act of the Legislature, to add his mother's name to the one which he had already made distinguished in the Republic of Letters. He died at his residence on the Hudson River, not far from Tarrytown, New York. 1. A Year in Spain; by a Young American, Bost., 1829, 2 vols. 12mo; Lon., 1831, 2 vols. 12mo. Enlarged, N. York, 1836, 3 vols. 12mo. Trans. into Swedish. This work gained the lively raconteur great reputation in London: Washington Irving writes from there, shortly after its appearance in that city:

"It is quite the fashionable book of the day, and spoken of in the highest terms in the highest circles. If the lieutenant were in London at present he would be quite a lion."

The same distinguished author reviewed A Year in Spain for the London Quarterly, (Feb. 1831, xliv. 319–342,) and, at the close of a most complimentary paper, thus encourages the young aspirant for literary honours:

"We anticipate further and still more copious extracts from our gay and shrewd lieutenant's log-book. May he long continue his cruises by land and water! may he have as many adventures as Sinbad,—and as happy an exit out of them! may he survive to record them all in a book, and we to have the pleasure of reviewing it!"

The reviewer has survived to add many fresh laurels to his brows, and, at the expiration of nearly thirty years, still "lives, a prosperous gentleman," happy in the grateful admiration of the good and the refined of all climes, and happier still in the affection of his friends, his family, and his countrymen. See life of WASHINGTON IRVING, p. 935 of this Dictionary.

A Year in Spain was also reviewed in the London Monthly Review, cxxiv. 533; Fraser's Magazine, v. 436; North American Review, xxx. 237, (by W. Phillips;) and Southern Review, viii. 154. "This is a fine piece of biography: it is both a just and true delineation of the character of that gallant and heroic commander, and a noble tribute to his memory."—REV. DR. COGSWELL.

"The brilliant victory of Lake Erie was for years after its occurrence a source of crimination and recrimination as to the relative merits of the first and second in command. The three publications above named [1. Burgess's Battles of Lake Erie; 2. Biography of Commodore Elliott; 3. Mackenzie's Life of Perry] leave little doubt of the soundness of the popular opinion, which makes Perry the hero of the victory."—PRESIDENT KING, of Columbia College: Oakley's ed. of Kent and King's Course of English Reading, 1853, 40.

7. The Life of Commodore Stephen Decatur, Bost., 1846, 12mo; being vol. xxi. [New Series, xi.] of Jared Sparks's Library of American Biography.

"Commander Mackenzie's book is a fine specimen of naval biography, thoroughly imbued with the spirit of his calling. To our own seamen it must become what Southey's fascinating Life of Nelson has long been to the members of the British navy, the text-book of excellence in the service, the authentic and striking portrait of the favourite hero of the profession."—FRANCIS BOWEN: N. Amer. Rev., lxiv. 217–237.

Commander Mackenzie left in MS. a journal of his Tour in Ireland, which it is to be hoped will not be withheld from the public. The literary taste of this excellent writer enabled him to make a profitable use of his professional knowledge; and both were highly appreciated by his attached friend Washington Irving, who thus acknowledges his assistance in one of the most important of the works which have conferred such merited distinction on the author of The Sketch-Book:

"The author of this work is indebted for the able examination of the route of Columbus to an officer of the navy of the United States, whose name he regrets not being at liberty to mention. He has been greatly benefited in various parts of this history by nautical information from the same intelligent source."—Life and Voyages of Christopher Columbus, &c., iii. 366.

"Note to the Revised Edition of 1848.

"In the present revised edition the author feels at liberty to give the merit of the very masterly paper on the route of Columbus, where it is justly due. It was furnished him at Madrid by the late Commander Alexander Slidell Mackenzie, of the United States Navy, whose modesty shrunk from affixing his name to an article so calculated to do him credit, and which has since challenged the high eulogiums of men of nautical science."—Ibid., iii. 380, q. v.

It is as an essayist that Mackenzie has acquired the most reputation; but these are now so nearly forgotten that "a gentleman need not be ashamed of owning that he has not read them." See p. 90 of this Dictionary: life of BACON, FRANCIS, BARON VERULAM.

"His Miscellaneous Essays, both in prose and verse, may now be dispensed with, or laid aside, without difficulty. They have not vigour enough for long life. But, if they be considered as the elegant amusement of a statesman and lawyer who had little leisure for the cultivation of letters, they afford a striking proof of the variety of his accomplishments and of the refinement of his taste. In several of his Moral Essays both the subject and the manner betray an imitation of Cowley, who was at that moment beginning the reformation of English style."—SIR JAMES MACKINTOSH: Edin. Rev., xxxvi. 5, and in his Works, ii. 120.

Mr. Hallam does not think so well of the Essays:

"The Essays of Sir George Mackenzie are empty and diffuse: the style is full of pedantic words to a degree of barbarism; and, though they were chiefly written after the Revolution, he seems to have wholly formed himself on the older writers, such as Sir Thomas Browne, or even Feltham. He affects the obsolete and unpleasing termination of the third person in the verb in eth, which was going out of use even in the pulpit, besides other rust of archaism. Nothing can be more unlike the manner of Dryden, Locke, or Temple. In his matter he seems a mere declaimer,—as if the world would any longer endure the trivial morality which the sixteenth century had borrowed from Seneca or the dull ethics of sermons. It is probable that, as Mackenzie was a man who had seen and read much, he must have some better passages than I have found in glancing shortly at his works."—Lit. Hist. of Europe, 4th ed. Lon., 1854, iii. 559.

That Evelyn greatly admired Sir George's writings, (see his letter to Cowley, 12th March, 1666,) and Dryden highly valued and profited by his criticisms, (see his Discourse on the Origin and Progress of Satire, prefixed to his Journal,) we have ample evidence. Mackenzie, Henry, 1745–1831, a native of Edinburgh, the son of Joshua Mackenzie, M.D., was educated at the University of Edinburgh; subsequently became an attorney of the Scottish Court of Exchequer, and studied English Exchequer practice in London; in 1804, was rewarded for his political tracts in defence of the tories by the office of Comptroller of Taxes for Scotland, and retained this lucrative post until his death. His house was for many years the principal resort of the distinguished literary and political characters of Edinburgh and of all visitors who could secure a proper introduction.

"Henry Mackenzie's excellent conversation, agreeable family, good evening parties, and the interest attached to united age and reputation, made his house one of the pleasantest. One of the Arbitri Elegantiarum of Old Edinburgh, he survived to flourish in a new scene."—Lord Cockburn's Memorials of his Time, chap. v., 1856, q. v.

His literary productions are as follows: 1. The Man of Feeling; a Novel, 1771, 8vo. Pub. anonymously, and not claimed by the author until appropriated by Mr. Eccles, of Bath, who produced a copy of the whole written in his own hand, with blottings, interlineations, and corrections. The style of The Man of Feeling has been thought to resemble that of Tristram Shandy; but Sir Walter Scott thinks the points of difference quite as many and as striking as the resemblances. He concludes his comparison with the remark,—

"Yet, while marking this broad and distinct difference between these two authors, the most celebrated certainly among those who are termed sentimental, it is but fair to Sterne to add that, although Mackenzie has rejected his license of wit and flights of imagination, retrenched in a great measure his episodical digressions, and altogether banished the indecency and buffoonery to which he had too frequent recourse, still, their volumes must be accounted as belonging to the same class; and, amongst the thousand imitators who have pursued their path, we cannot recollect one English author who is entitled to the same honour. . . . In future compositions, the author dropped even that resemblance which the style of The Man of Feeling bears in some particulars to the works of Sterne; and this country may boast that, in one instance at least, she has produced, in Mackenzie, a writer of pure, musical, Addisonian prose, which retains the quality of vigour without forfeiting that of cleverness and simplicity."—Life of Mackenzie: Scott's Miscell. Prose Works, Abbotsford ed., 1850, 345, 346.

"His Man of Feeling is the offspring of the Sentimental Journey and Werter schools: it is better regulated than the first, and less frantic than the second: the hero is possessed with a passion which he has too much modesty to utter, and dies, of true love and decline, when all wish him to live. The scene in the madhouse should be learned by heart."—Allan Cunningham's Biog. and Crit. Hist. of the Lit. of the Last Fifty Years, 1833.

"The tender pleasure which The Man of Feeling excites is wholly without alloy. Its hero is the most beautiful personification of gentleness, patience, and meek sufferings which the heart can conceive."—SIR T. N. TALFOURD: Lon. New Month. Mag., and in his Crit. and Miscell. Writings.

"The title of 'The Man of Feeling' adhered to him ever after the publication of that novel; and it was a good example of the difference there sometimes is between a man and his work. Strangers used to fancy that he must be a pensive, sentimental Harley; whereas he was far better,—a hard-headed, practical man, as full of worldly wisdom as most of his fictitious characters are devoid of it, and this without in the least impairing the affectionate softness of his heart."—LORD COCKBURN: Memorials of his Time, 1856.

2. The Man of the World; a Novel, 1773, 2 vols. 12mo.

"It seems to be intended as a second part to The Man of Feeling. It breathes the same tone of exquisite moral delicacy and of refined sentimentality."—SIR WALTER SCOTT: Life of Mackenzie.

"'The Man of the World' proved that Mackenzie's genius had not strength for three volumes, but belonged to short romances and brief tales, where one action suffices, and one train of sentiment is sufficient."—ALLAN CUNNINGHAM: Biog. and Crit. Hist. &c.

"The attempt to obtain intricacy of plot disturbs the emotion which in the other works of the author is so harmoniously excited. A tale of sentiment should be most simple. Its whole effect depends on its keeping the tenor of its predominant feeling unbroken. Another defect of this story is the length of time over which it spreads its narrative. . . . Still, there are in this tale scenes of pathos delicious as any which even the author himself has drawn."—SIR T. N. TALFOURD: Lon. New Month. Mag., and in his Crit. and Miscell. Writings.

3. The Prince of Tunis; a Tragedy, 1773, 8vo.

"Represented at Edinburgh, in 1763, [1773,] with great success."—SIR WALTER SCOTT: Life of Mackenzie.

4. Julia de Roubigné; a Tale, 1777, 2 vols. 8vo.

"Julia de Roubigné is, on the whole, the most delightful of the author's works. There is in this tale enough of plot to keep alive curiosity and sharpen the interest which the sentiment awakens, without any of those strange turns and perplexing incidents which break the current of sympathy. The diction is in perfect keeping with the subject,—'most musical, most melancholy,'—with 'golden cadences' responsive to the thoughts. There is a plaintive charm in the image presented to us of the heroine almost too fair to dwell on."—SIR T. N. TALFOURD: Lon. New Month. Mag., and in his Crit. and Miscell. Writings.

"The accumulation of woes in 'Julia de Roubigné' makes it too melancholy to read: it is more like a revelation made in confession than a fine work of fancy and feeling. It is not a difficult thing to heap woe on woe."—ALLAN CUNNINGHAM: Biog. and Crit. Hist., &c.

"Perhaps, on the whole, Julia de Roubigné gives the reader too much actual pain to be so generally popular as The Man of Feeling, since we have found its superiority to that beautiful essa humac sensibility often disputed by those whose taste we are in general inclined to defer to. The very acute feelings which the work usually excites among the readers whose sympathies are liable to be awakened by scenes of fictitious distress we are disposed to ascribe to the extreme accuracy and truth of the sentiments, as well as the beautiful manner in which they are expressed. There are few who have not, at one period of life, broken ties of love and friendship, secret disappointments of the heart, to mourn over; and we know no book which recalls the recollection of such more severely than Julia de Roubigné."—Sir Walter Scott: Life of Mackenzie.

"Buller. 'Which of his works do you like best?'

"North. 'Julia de Roubigné and the Story of La Roche. I thought that vein had been extinct till Adam Blair came out. But Nature in none of her domains can be exhausted.' "—Noctes Ambros., April, 1822.

5. Translations from the German of Lessing's Set of Horses, and some other dramatic pieces, 1791, 12mo. Mackenzie also edited The Mirror, (pub. Jan. 23, 1779, to May 27, 1780,) and contributed forty-two papers to its columns; edited The Lounger, (pub. Feb. 6, 1785, to Jan. 6, 1787.) and contributed fifty-seven papers to its columns; wrote The Spanish Fathers and The Shipwreck, Tragedies, and The White Hypocrite and The Force of Fashion, Comedies; was the author of a Life of Thomas Blacklock, (see p 196 of this Dictionary,) and a Life of John Home, (see p. 873 of this Dictionary, and Lon. Gent. Mag., 1846, Pt. 2, 565;) wrote the Report of the Committee of the Highland Society of Scotland appointed to inquire into the Nature and Authenticity of the Poems of Ossian, 1805, '10, 8vo: pub. an account of the German Theatre in Trans. Soc. Edin., ii. 154, 1790; the Lives of Lord Abercromby and William Tytler, in same Trans., iv. 1, 17, 1798; wrote some poetical pieces, and edited the Prize Essays and Transactions of the Highland Society of Scotland, 1799, 3 vols. 8vo; new ed., 1816, 8vo. His principal political publication, and the one to which he owed his profitable post under Government, was An Account of the Proceedings of the Parliament of 1784, which so greatly pleased Mr. Pitt that he revised and corrected the tract, and some years later, as we have seen, liberally rewarded the fortunate author. His essays have been highly commended by eminent authorities.

"The Northern Addison, who revived the art of periodical writing, and sketched, though with a light pencil, the follies and the lesser vices of his time, has showed himself a master of playful satire. The historian of the Homespun Family may place his narrative, without fear of shame, by the side of The Vicar of Wakefield. Colonel Caustic and Umfraville are masterly conceptions of the laudator temporis acti; and many passages in those papers which Mr. Mackenzie contributed to the Mirror and Lounger attest with what truth, spirit, and ease he could describe, assume, and sustain a variety of characters."—Sir Walter Scott: Life of Mackenzie.

"In that delicate perception of human character and human manners so correctly, so elegantly, and often so humorously delineated in the numbers of 'The Mirror' and 'Lounger,' where Mr. Mackenzie was the chief contributor, as well as in his other works and in his general views of the great principles of moral conduct, there have been few authors more distinguished."—Blackw. Mag., xxix. 576.

He pub. a collective ed. of his Works in 1808, Edin., 8 vols. cr. 8vo, with a portrait of the author. Contents: The Man of Feeling; The Man of the World; Julia de Roubigné; Papers from The Mirror and The Lounger; Miscellanies; Poems and Dramas now first published. Subsequently there was pub. in 1 vol. The Works of Henry Mackenzie, Esq., with a Critical Dissertation on the Tales of the Author by John Galt, Esq. See, in addition to the authorities above cited, Remains of the Rev. Edmund D. Griffin, N. York, 1831, 2 vols.; Scott's Poet. Works, Abbotsford ed., Edin., 1851, 548, 561: T. B. Macaulay's Crit. and Hist. Essays, Lon., 1854, ii. 522; Blackw. Mag., xi. 360, 475, 477, xxiii. 679, xxix. 576.

"I never saw a form and face so instinct with goodness, so attractive of affection. The tenderness poured forth in all his works seems diffused around his person; and I defy any man that has a soul to admire the former more than he shall feel inclined at once to love the latter."—Rev. E. D. Griffin: Remains.

"The principal object of Mackenzie, in all his novels, has been to reach and sustain a tone of moral pathos, by representing the effect of incidents, whether important or trifling, upon the human mind, and especially on those which are not only just, honourable, and intelligent, but so framed as to be responsive to those finer feelings to which ordinary hearts are callous."—Sir Walter Scott: Life of Mackenzie.

"Henry Mackenzie, to whom we owe (in my opinion) the most exquisite pathetic fictions in our language."—Sir James Mackintosh: Memoirs of his Life.

"Henry Mackenzie is one of the most original in thought, and splendid in fancy, and chaste in expression, that can be found in the whole line of our worthies. He will live as long as our tongue, or longer."—Prof. Wilson: Noctes Ambros., April, 1822, in Blackw. Mag., xi. 477.

"The beautiful visions of his pathetic imagination," says Wilson on another occasion, "had stamped a soft and delicious, but deep and indelible, impression on my mind long before I had heard the name of criticism. The very names of the heroes and heroines of his delightful stories sounded in my ears like the echoes of some old romantic melody, too simple and too beautiful to have been framed in these degenerate, over-scientific days."

"The polished elegance and graceful pathos of Henry Mackenzie made his name widely known: he is a master in the neat, the pretty, and the beautiful; he knows how to prepare and arrange his materials so as to waste nothing; he sets all in a proper light: as he has just enough, and no more, to complete his undertaking, he cannot afford to be prodigal of his treasures, and is compelled to exhibit his sentiments and his incidents like flowers at a show. He has, perhaps, written some of the most touching little stories in the language."—Allan Cunningham: Biog. and Crit. Hist., &c.

"Mackenzie is a sort of link between Sterne and Scott. He belongs to a very small weak off-shoot of English literature,—the sentimental style, which Cumberland made nauseous, and which is not in the national taste. Sterne's mixture of coarseness is endured from his infinite humour, but his unclean dress of linsey-woolsey trimmed with blonde lace—the sensibility stuff with the thorough indecencies—has happily died out; and Mr. Mackenzie's sensibilities without the indecencies was too lack-a-daisical to last."—Portfolio of a Man of the World: Lon. Gent. Mag., 1846, Part 2, 565.

The eminent critic next to be quoted speaks in a very different tone:

"We rejoice to know and feel that these delicious tales cannot perish. Since they were written, indeed, the national imagination has been in a great degree perverted by strong excitements, and 'fed on poisons till they have become a kind of nutriment.' But the quiet and unpresuming beauties of these works depend not on the fashion of the world. They cannot be out of date till the dreams of young imagination shall vanish, and the deepest sympathies of love and hope be stilled forever. While other works are extolled, admired, and reviewed, these will be loved and wept over. Their author, in the evening of his days, may truly feel that he has not lived in vain. Gentle hearts shall ever blend their thoughts of him among their remembrances of the benefactors of their youth. And when the fever of the world 'shall hang upon the beatings of their hearts,' how often will their spirits turn to him who, as he cast a soft seriousness over the morning of life, shall assist in tranquillizing its noontide sorrows!"—Sir T. Mackenzie, R. Shelton, M.D., D.C.L., b. 1809 in Limerick, Ireland, is second son of Captain Kenneth Mackenzie, author of a volume of Gaelic poetry, Glasgow, 1796, (ante.) The subject of our notice studied medicine in Cork, and graduated in Dublin, but has not practised. Has devoted himself to literature from his eighteenth year, when he undertook the editorship of a newspaper in England, in which capacity he continued, in various localities, until 1845, when he became London Secretary of a railway-company, which latter position he resigned in 1851. In the interval he contributed largely to leading periodicals and annuals in England and America; and, writing a weekly news-letter to the New York Evening Star, from 1834 to the decease of that paper, was the first regular salaried European correspondent of the American press. Was made LL.D. of Glasgow University in 1834, and D.C.L. of Oxford in 1844. Published Lays of Palestine in 1828, 12mo; wrote a considerable portion of The Georgian Era, 1832–34; Titian, a Venetian Art-Novel, in 1843, 3 vols. p. 8vo; a Life of Guizot, (prefixed to a translation of Democracy and its Mission,) in 1846; Partnership "en Commandite," a legal commercial work, in 1847, 8vo; Mornings at Matlock, a Collection of Stories, 1850, 3 vols. p. 8vo. Came to New York in 1852, where he has continued, connected with the newspaper-press, and has edited, with very copious notes and original biographies of the authors, Sheil's Sketches of the Irish Bar, 1854, 2 vols. 12mo; The Noctes Ambrosianæ of Blackwood's Magazine, 1854, 5 vols. 12mo; De Quincey's Klosterheim, 1855, 16mo; Life of Curran, 1855, 12mo; Lady Morgan's O'Briens and O'Flaherties, 1857, 2 vols. 12mo; Dr. Maginn's Miscellaneous Works, 1855–57, 5 vols. 12mo. His original works in America have been Bits of Blarney, 1855, 12mo; Tressilian, or The Story-Tellers, 1857, 12mo. He is now engaged in the preparation of three new works,—viz.: Poetry and Poets of Ireland, Men of Ninety-Eight, Actors and Actresses,—and contemplates new editions of several others. Since the above was written, Dr. Mackenzie has removed (Aug. 1857) to Philadelphia, and assumed the duties connected with the foreign and literary editorship of The Press, a new daily paper of that city.

"The pervading personality, lively spirit, and great accuracy of Dr. Mackenzie's notes as a book-editor constitute their value. His life has been passed in intimacy and correspondence with the leading literati and politicians of his time, and he has a remarkable memory for dates, events, and persons, which overflows into expression when he puts pen to paper. Such also is his conversation,—crowded with anecdotes of notable and noticeable persons and things; and no one would deem, from his lively conversation, that he had nearly exhausted libraries as a reader and contributed to fill them as a writer."

The reader will find many of Dr. Mackenzie's interesting reminiscences of his distinguished literary contemporaries in his edit. of Noctes Ambrosianæ, (see Index.) By his first wife Sir James had issue a son, who died in infancy, and three daughters,—viz.: 1. Mary, married to Claudius James Rich, Esq., of Bombay; 2. Maitland, married to W. Erskine, Esq.; 3. Catherine, married to Sir W. Wiseman, Bart. By his second wife, who died at Chesne, near Genoa, May 6, 1830, he had one son and a daughter,—viz.: Robert James, Fellow of New College, Oxford, and Frances, married to H. Wedgewood, Esq., Staffordshire. We shall now proceed to consider the distinguished subject of our notice,—

I. MACKINTOSH THE POLITICAL PHILOSOPHER.

In our life of Edmund Burke (see pp. 290–291 of this Dictionary) we have referred to the enthusiastic reception accorded by the opponents of the French revolutionary doctrines to the celebrated "Reflections" on the political storm which had already swept the throne and the altar from France, and threatened the destruction of civilized society throughout Europe. The publication of the Reflections immediately elicited legions of so-called answers and refutations; but, with the exception of Paine's Rights of Man, no one of these numerous rejoinders seems to have counteracted to any perceptible degree the overwhelming influence on the public mind of the irresistible logic and fervid eloquence of the closest reasoner, as well as the most impassioned pleader, of the age. It was at this opportune moment—opportune for a writer who sought to attract the eye of the public—that Mackintosh gave to the world his Vindiciæ Gallicæ; or, A Defence of the French Revolution and its English Admirers against the Accusations of the Right Hon. Edmund Burke, including some Strictures on the late production of Mons. De Calonne, April, 1791. The Friends of the People (the Society of this name, indeed, was not instituted until the following year) were not ignorant of the important aid shortly to be expected from their valuable ally; and Paine, now engaged in the preparation of The Rights of Man, remarked to an acquaintance of Mackintosh:

"Tell your friend that he will come too late unless he hastens, for after the appearance of my reply nothing more will remain to be said."

Paine certainly was no contemptible antagonist; but, had his talents been far greater, his political principles irrefutable, and his private morals immaculate, he would still have lacked elements of strength the possession of which gave Mackintosh a very decided advantage:

"Those who remember," says the author of the Pleasures of Hope, "the impression that was made by Burke's writings on the then living generation, will recollect that, in the better-educated classes of society, there was a general proneness to go with Burke; and it is my sincere opinion that that proneness would have become universal, if such a mind as Mackintosh's had not presented itself, like a breakwater, to the general springtide of Burkism. I may be reminded that there was such a man as Thomas Paine, and that he strongly answered, at the bar of public opinion, all the arguments of Burke. I do not deny this fact: and I should be sorry if I could be blind, even with tears for Mackintosh in my eyes, to the services that have been rendered to the cause of truth by the shrewdness and the courage of Thomas Paine. But without disparagement to Paine, in a great and essential view, it must be admitted that, though radically sound in sense, he was deficient in the strategetics of philosophy; whilst Mackintosh met Burke perfectly his equal in the tactics of moral science and beauty of style and illustration. Hence Mackintosh went, as the apostle of liberalism, among a class—perhaps too influential in society—to whom the manner of Paine was repulsive. Paine had something of a coarse hatred towards Burke. Mackintosh abhorred Burke's principles, but he had a chivalrous admiration of his genius. He could foil him, moreover, at his own weapons. He was logician enough to detect the sophist by the rules of logic; and he turned against Burke not only popular opinion, but classical and tasteful feelings."—Life of Mackintosh, vol. i. chap. ii.

That the Vindiciæ Gallicæ succeeded in immediately gaining the public eye and ear—we are not so certain of the heart—is abundantly proved by the rapid sale of three editions, all pub. in the same year. Of course, it at once attracted the interested attention of the great political leaders of the day: Fox greeted it with dignified satisfaction; Parr eulogized it with turgid Johnsonian bombast; and the "mixed multitude" of Red Republicans who followed the army of political reformers forgave the philosophy which they could not understand for the sake of the spoils which they trusted soon to divide.

"An honourable gentleman," says Mr. Fox in the House of Commons, "has quoted a most able book on the subject of the French Revolution, the work of Mr. Mackintosh; and I rejoice to see that gentlemen begin to acknowledge the merits of that eminent writer, and that the impression that it made upon me at the time is now felt and acknowledged even by those who disputed its authority. . . . It now appears that I did not greatly overrate this performance, and that those persons now quote Mr. Mackintosh as an authority who before treated him with splenetic scorn."

"In Mackintosh I see the sternness of a republican without his acrimony, and the ardour of a reformer without his impetuosity. His taste in morals, like that of Mr. Burke's, is equally pure and delicate with his taste in literature. His mind is so comprehensive that generalities cease to be barren, and so vigorous that detail itself becomes interesting. He introduces every question with perspicuity, states it with precision, and pursues it with easy, unaffected method. Sometimes, perhaps, he may amuse his readers with excursions into paradox, but he never bewilders them by flights into romance. His philosophy is far more just and amiable than the philosophy of Paine; and his eloquence is only not equal to the eloquence of Burke. He is argumentative without sophistry, and sublime without extravagance."—Dr. Parr.

"At the time when the Vindiciæ Gallicæ first made its appearance, as a reply to the Reflections on the French Revolution, it was cried up by the partisans of the new school as a work superior in the charms of composition to its redoubted rival: in acuteness, depth, and soundness of reasoning, of course, there was supposed to be no comparison. . . . His Vindiciæ Gallicæ is a work of great labour, great ingenuity, great brilliancy, and great vigour. It is a little too antithetical in the structure of its periods, too dogmatical in the announcement of its opinions. Sir James has, we believe, rejected something of the false brilliant of the one, as he has retracted some of the abrupt extravagance of the other."—Hazlitt's Spirit of the Age: Sir James Mackintosh.

"The 'Vindiciæ Gallicæ' was an attempt, at once ingenious and profound, to justify the first steps of the French Revolution upon the theory of the British Constitution, and thus to refute Mr. Burke upon his own principles. The events which verified that illustrious writer's predictions had not then occurred. . . . There was, however, a power of reasoning as well as a spirit of candour in the 'Vindiciæ Gallicæ' that did not escape Mr. Burke, who was pleased to cultivate an acquaintance with the author and to express his admiration of the work. It certainly produced a great impression upon me. The first time it fell into my hands I devoted the entire night to the perusal of it, and rose with a strong admiration of the various powers as well as the learning it exhibited, and an equal desire to become acquainted with the author."—Sir James Scarlett, (Lord Abinger:) Mackintosh's Life, vol. ii. chap. iv.

Mr. Canning admitted to Mr. Sharp that he had read the Vindiciæ Gallicæ, "on its first coming out, with as much admiration as he had ever felt."

"Read Mackintosh's Vindiciæ Gallicæ. His style and manner, in this piece, are magnificent, but uniformly cumbrous, and occasionally warm. He has infinitely improved both in his Preliminary Discourse, though some of the ponderosity still remains. There can hardly be a more express and full contradiction than in two passages,—p. 265 of the Vindiciæ and p. 49 of the Discourse."—Green's Diary of a Lover of Lit., April the 29th, 1799, Ipswich, 1810. 4to. 130–131.

"The literary merit of this work was very considerable in itself; and its reputation was, from some auxiliary circumstances, still greater. The splendid art of Burke's genius illuminated the opposition of the satellite:

> 'Iste tulit pretium jam nunc certaminis hujus,
> Quo cum victus erit, mecum certâsse feretur.'

"The very contest was a distinction in the eyes of the world, while the Jacobin adversaries of Burke extolled and exaggerated the powers of their new champion with all the zeal of party."

Whilst such was the reception of the Vindiciæ Gallicæ at home, it may well be believed that it was received with at least equal enthusiasm in France: the Duke of Orleans (afterwards Louis Philippe) translated the greater part of it into French; and we know that Bonaparte, years after its publication, sounded its praises in the presence of its author. Doubtless its influence tended to the completion of some of the gloomiest predictions of Burke; and this conviction must have weighed heavily upon the conscience of the author when experience had taught him to unteach his first lessons in political philosophy. Nine years after the publication of the Vindiciæ Gallicæ he writes to George Moore:

"I greatly admire your honesty and magnanimity in openly professing your conversion. I think I shall have the courage to imitate you. I have too long submitted to mean and evasive compromises. It is my intention, in this winter's lectures, [On the Law of Nature and of Nations,] to profess, publicly and unequivocally, that I abhor, abjure, and forever renounce the French Revolution, with all its sanguinary history, its abominable principles, and forever execrable leaders. I hope I shall be able to wipe off the disgrace of having been once betrayed into an approbation of that conspiracy against God and man, the greatest scourge of the world, and the chief stain upon human annals."—Life of Mackintosh, vol. i. chap. iii.

To the same effect is the following, which we find recorded in George Moore's Diary:

"To some Frenchmen, who had complimented him at Paris on his Vindiciæ Gallicæ, he answered, 'Messieurs, vous m'avez bien refuté.'"

In Sir James's Diary, kept at Bombay, he remarks, under date of March 23, 1811:

"It is now about twenty years since I published my answer to Burke. It was not a brilliant dawn, but it promised a better day: we are now in the afternoon."

His admirable letter to Richard Sharp, written from Bombay in 1804, in which he expatiates at length upon the change in his political views, will not be soon forgotten by those who have read Sir James's Memoirs:

"Filled with enthusiasm, in very early youth," he remarks, "by the promise of a better order of society, I most unwarily ventured on publication when my judgment and taste were equally immature."

To this letter, to his Diary, November 10, 1811, and to Lord Macaulay's and Lord Jeffrey's eloquent defence of the political integrity of their illustrious friend, we are content to refer the reader who seeks for a fair exposition of a subject which the coarse-minded Birmingham Doctor had not delicacy enough to handle nor candour sufficient to impartially judge. II. Mackintosh the Mental and Moral Philosopher.

The works of our author which claim consideration under this head are—1. Dissertation on the Progress of Ethical Philosophy, chiefly during the Seventeenth and Eighteenth Centuries. This was intended as a continuation of Dugald Stewart's unfinished dissertation, (prefixed to Encyclopedia Britannica,) Exhibiting a General View of the Progress of Metaphysical, Ethical, and Political Philosophy since the Revival of Letters in Europe. Sir James's Dissertation was commenced about September, 1828, and, after many interruptions from sickness and other causes, completed in the spring of 1830. These interruptions so far curtailed the original plan that a survey of Political Philosophy, and the History of the Ethical Philosophy of the Continent, were necessarily omitted, and the original design of Stewart still remains uncompleted; for the later works in this department can hardly be said to exhaust so prolific a theme. This task was truly a labour of love to Mackintosh.

"You will see," he says, in a letter to Mr. Napier, (editor of the Encyc. Brit.,) dated January, 1829, "I have made some (I hope useful) additions to one of the sections; and I would have made more if I could have spared the time. But, alas! I have none to spare; otherwise, I like this sort of work much better than any other."

Shortly afterwards he writes:

"I begin to hope well of my discourse, which I endeavour to make a development of ethical principles as they historically arose, —a new attempt in our language."

Again:

"The part in which I think I have done most service is that in which I have endeavoured to slip in a foundation under Butler's doctrine of the supremacy of conscience, which he left baseless."

Yet he had no hesitation in acknowledging his obligations to the celebrated author of the Analogy:

"He said that 'he had learnt all his philosophy from Butler's three first Sermons.'"—Mackintosh's Life, vol. ii. chap. vii.

To the volume from which we have just quoted we must refer the reader for a lucid synopsis of Sir James's Dissertation, in a letter from his friend Sir Henry Holland, M.D. Those who have taken the trouble to read our life of Robert Hall, on a preceding page of this Dictionary, will have no difficulty in crediting Sir James's assertion that the study of Ethical Philosophy was "a sort of work which he liked much better than any other." The taste which commenced perhaps almost in childhood, and was so assiduously cherished at college in later years, softened the asperities of political partisanship and beguiled the tedious hours of Indian exile. He who delights to learn delights also to instruct: the overflowing river facilitates its own progress while fertilizing the banks which profit by its superfluous waters; and the clouds are no losers by the genial showers "which make glad the heart" of the husbandman and revive the face of the earth. It was pleasure in the communication of knowledge which—as we shall see presently—converted the solitary student into a public lecturer on the Laws of Nations; and it was the gratification of the same taste which nerved him to the daily struggle against physical languor and mental distraction, as he slowly added page to page of the elaborate Dissertation on Ethical Philosophy. Sir James's sufficiency as a teacher of moral philosophy has not been permitted to pass unchallenged; but we can conceive of but few higher authorities on a point of this nature than Mackintosh's earliest antagonist in the arena of metaphysical discussion,—Robert Hall, of Arnsby:

"'I know no man,' said Hall, repeatedly and emphatically, 'equal to Sir James in talents. . . . His genius is best adapted for metaphysical speculation; but, had he chosen moral philosophy, he would probably have surpassed every living writer. . . . I am persuaded that if Sir James Mackintosh had enjoyed leisure, and had exerted himself, he would have completely outdone Jeffrey and Stewart and all the metaphysical writers of our times.'"—Rev. Robert Balmer's Conversations with Robert Hall, in 1819 and 1823; Hall's Works, 11th ed., Lon., 1853, vi. 122, 123.

Lord Cockburn doubtless represents the general sentiment prevailing at the time among scholars when he remarks that, on the retirement of Dugald Stewart in 1810 from the chair of Moral Philosophy in the University of Edinburgh,

"Brown, a profound metaphysician, an enthusiast in the science of mind, and, in a peculiar way, an eloquent lecturer, was perhaps the only man in the empire, except Mackintosh, who was worthy of coming after Stewart."

Again, when Professor Brown (who was elected to fill the vacancy) died in 1820, his lordship tells us,

"The friends of philosophy, recollecting what this class had so long been, suggested Sir James Mackintosh as Brown's proper successor."—Lord Cockburn's Memorials of his Time.

"He had looked into every moral and metaphysical question," says Sydney Smith, "from Plato to Paley."—Mackintosh's Life, vol. ii. chap. viii.

Robert Hall's earnest desire was partially gratified by the appearance of the Dissertation; and he commended it in unequivocal terms. We are told in Sir James's life that "He recurred with evident satisfaction to the good opinion which Robert Hall had expressed of his Ethical Dissertation."—Vol. ii. chap. vii.

It is known that the Dissertation was attacked with much severity by Mr. James Mill, in his Fragment on Mackintosh, pub. anonymously in 1835. Professor Wilson, also, uses no measured language in his censures on the Dissertation, (Blackwood's Mag., xxviii. 586–587;) and the fervid eulogy of De Quincey (Essays on Philosophical Writers) is somewhat chilled by the searching ventilation to which portions of the treatise are exposed. The opinion of Dr. Chalmers on this subject will justly carry great weight:

"I have often regretted the distraction to which Sir James's mind was exposed through life between politics and literature; and the regret has been much enhanced by my late perusal of his admirable Essay on Ethical science—a production which has convinced me how mightily, if in possession of unbounded leisure, he would have enriched the philosophy of our age."—Mackintosh's Life, vol. ii. chap. viii.

"He furnished," says Lord Jeffrey, "in a preliminary discourse to the Encyclopædia Britannica, by far the best history of ethical philosophy which has ever been given to the world."—Edin. Rev., lxii. 211.

"That inimitable 'Dissertation on Ethical Philosophy.'"—Lord Jeffrey: Mackintosh's Life, vol. ii. chap. viii., q. v.

"It appears, as far as it is lawful for us to judge of such mysteries, to be done with taste, discrimination, and, as far as the subject would admit, that ease and perspicuity which flow from the complete mastery of the subject."—Rt. Hon. J. W. Croker: Lon. Quar. Rev., liv. 292.

"His Historical Dissertation upon the progress of Ethical Science, which it is impossible to read without kindling into enthusiasm, leaves us, with its bright but rapid light, just on the threshold of the very inquiries to which it points our way."—Judge Story: Life and Letters, ii. 562.

Alexander H. Everett, (see N. Amer. Rev., xxxv. 51,) whilst doing full justice to the merits of the Dissertation, instances as grave faults,—hasty preparation, the absence of any notice of the ethical theories of the modern Germans, the almost total silence respecting the French philosophers, and the very partial survey even of the English metaphysicians.

"Notwithstanding these deficiencies," he continues, "it will be read with deep interest by students of moral science, and by all who take an interest in the higher departments of intellectual research or enjoy the beauties of elegant language applied to the illustration of 'divine philosophy.' It gives us, on an important branch of the most important of the sciences, the reflections of one of the few master-minds that are fitted by original capacity and patient study to probe it to the bottom. . . . The articles on Bentham, Stewart, and Brown are the longest and most elaborate in the work. They will amply reward the closest attention."

Mr. Everett proceeds to notice Mackintosh's important peculiarity in the supposition "that Conscience, or the Moral Faculty, is not an original part of our constitution, but a 'secondary formation,' created at a later period of life, by the effect of Association of Ideas, out of a variety of elements existing in the mind."

We lack both space and time to venture, "like Pyrrho, on the sea of speculation," or rather on the metaphysical battle-field, to which these ancient war-cries invite us; and we content ourselves, without expressing any opinion of our own upon this vexato quæstio, with quoting a few of the concluding lines of Sir Henry Holland's synopsis of the Dissertation, to which we have on a preceding page called the attention of the curious reader:

"I will merely affirm that nowhere is the highest ground of moral action more distinctly assumed or more completely vindicated, nowhere are its relations to the well-being of man more beautifully exemplified, than in the work which I have ventured thus briefly and imperfectly to analyse."

"It cannot be doubted," remarks Sir Henry, on a preceding page, "that the form under which this Dissertation was published, as one of a series of discourses prefixed to an edition of the 'Encyclopedia Britannica,' contributed further [see Sir Henry's preliminary remarks] to keep it from the general knowledge of the world. Nor has this obstacle been yet removed by any separate form of publication."

This may remind the reader of a passage in the Portfolio of a Man of the World:

"Saturday. Sitting with ——, who was not well, Sir James Mackintosh came in: Playfair's Supplement to the Encyclopedia Britannica was on the table. I said it was a pity to have such a great work locked up in a book of mere reference. Sir James said that he and all the writers ever employed in these Supplements thought it a great compliment to be asked to do them. I said, 'You might as well have put Gray's Country Churchyard into Johnson's Dictionary, under the word Church, and expect it to be read.'

"M. 'It would: it would be taken out directly: and so will these Essays: any one of them that is worth preserving will become common.'"

See Lon. Gent. Mag., 1846, Pt. 1, 585.

We need hardly inform the student that the Dissertation on Ethical Philosophy was "taken out," and has become, if not "common," at least well known to scholars. It was pub. in 1836, 8vo, "with a Preface, by Mr. Whewell, containing an excellent view of its leading objects and doctrines."—Edin. Rev., lxii. 410.

See, in addition to authorities cited above, Henry's Hist. of Philos., vol. ii.; De Quincey's Essays on Philosoph. Writers, vol. i., 1854, 72–79; Hallam's Lit. Hist. of Europe, 4th ed., 1854, iii. 409; Moore's Memoirs, Jour. and Corresp., 1856, vii. 206–208; Warren's Law Studies, 1845, 171, 226; N. Amer. Rev., lxvi. 267, 270–272, (by Rev. A. P. Peabody, D.D.)

Among important contributions to the literature of Ethical Philosophy are to be classed Sir James's two papers on Stewart's Preliminary Dissertation to the Encyclopædia Britannica. These admirable essays will be found in the Edinburgh Review, vols. xxvii. 180–244. xxxvi. 220–267. A few pages extracted from these papers, and entitled On the Philosophical Genius of Lord Bacon and Mr. Locke, will be found in Mackintosh's Works, ed. 1854, vol. i. 315–344.

"It is chiefly as a moralist," remarks a late commentator on speculative philosophy, "that Sir James Mackintosh stood pre-eminent; and the ardour, the depth, and the learning with which he combated the selfish systems and pleaded for the authority and sanctity of the moral faculty in man contributed perhaps more than any single cause not of a religious nature, to oppose the bold advances of utilitarianism and infuse a healthier tone into the moral principles of the country. Without signifying our adherence to his peculiar theory respecting conscience, we still regard his thoughts and speculations as taking eminently the right direction; and, had he obtained leisure to mature his views and give them to the world in his own forcible and glowing style, it is the opinion of some best able to judge upon the subject (e.g. Robert Hall and Dr. Chalmers) that he would have placed the whole theory of morals upon a higher and more commanding position than it had ever occupied before in this country."—Morell's Hist. and Crit.

View of the Speculative Philosophy of Europe in the Nineteenth Century, chap. v. section 1.

Under this division of our subject we may perhaps properly include (2.) Discourse on the Law of Nature and Nations, already referred to as the preliminary lecture of a course on this subject delivered at Lincoln's Inn Hall in the spring of the year 1799. The title of this Discourse would justify us in placing it under the head either of Political Philosophy or Moral Philosophy, whilst the author's definition of his theme as conversant with the application of the "rules of morality," &c. protects the classification which we have selected from all reasonable censure. It is a striking proof of the very small number of minds to which topics of this important character successfully appeal, that, notwithstanding the praise which has been lavished on the Introductory Discourse, the public was content to let more than a quarter of a century elapse (1799 to 1828) before the second edition was demanded. We may here appropriately introduce a notice of the American edition, edited by Mr. J. G. Marvin, (Bost., 1843, 8vo,) which is enriched by a List of Works upon International Law, and a sketch of the author's life. A strong temptation is presented to linger for a few moments, or a few pages, over a description of the distinguished auditory who sought knowledge at the lecturer's lips, and of the indignation of a portion of his hearers when they heard the doctrines of conservatism preached by the late republican, and the philosophic author of The Reflections quoted in terms of unmeasured eulogy by the same apostle of liberty who had attacked him with such vigour in the Vindiciæ Gallicæ. But moments and pages are both scarce with us, and we push forward. A few graphic lines from Hazlitt (an unexceptionable witness in this case) may be accepted as a fair representation of the deep disgust excited among the radicals by this unlooked-for and to them mortifying spectacle:

"He grew warmer with success. Dazzling others by the brilliancy of his acquirements, dazzled himself by the admiration they excited, he lost fear as well as prudence; dared every thing, carried every thing before him. The Modern Philosophy—counterscarp, outworks, citadel, and all—fell without a blow, by the 'whiff and wind of his fell doctrine,' as if it had been a pack of cards. The volcano of the French Revolution was seen expiring in its own flames, like a bonfire made of straw: the principles of Reform were scattered in all directions, like chaff before the keen northern blast. He laid about him like one inspired; nothing could withstand his envenomed tooth. Like some savage beast got into the garden of fabled Hesperides, he made clear work of it, root and branch,—with white, foaming tusks

'Laid waste the borders and o'erthrew the bowers.'

"The havoc was amazing; the desolation was complete. As to our visionary skeptics and Utopian philosophers, they stood no chance with our lecturer: he did not 'carve them as a dish fit for the Gods, but hewed them as a carcass fit for hounds.' Poor Godwin, who had come, in the bonhommie and candour of his nature, to hear what new light had broken in upon his old friend, was obliged to quit the field, and slunk away after an exulting taunt thrown out at 'such fanciful chimeras as a golden mountain or a perfect man.'"—The Spirit of the Age: Sir James Mackintosh. Read the whole of this amusing protest: amusing in spite of its indignation.

Five years after the delivery of these famous lectures, Mackintosh has no difficulty in acknowledging that his political conversion—doubtless greatly owing to his celebrated conference with Edmund Burke in 1796—was promulgated in a creed from which his cooler judgment was disposed to make large deductions:

"As a political philosopher," he remarks, in his letter to Richard Sharp already referred to, "I will not say that I now entirely approve the very shades and tones of political doctrine which distinguished these lectures. I can easily see that I rebounded from my original opinions too far towards the opposite extreme. I was carried too far by anxiety to atone for my former errors. In opposing revolutionary principles, the natural heat of controversy led to excess."

Lord Jeffrey finds no such fault:

"He delivered in Lincoln's Inn Hall a series of lectures on the Law of Nature and Nations, in which, with singular eloquence, learning, and power of reasoning, he attempted to settle the rule of public and private duty, and to assign their just limits to the rights of a people and the authority of a government. The introductory lecture was published, and remains to this day the best summary and defence which has ever been made of the noble science of which it treats."—Edin. Rev., lxii. 210. Oct. 1835.

As regards his competency for this duty, Sydney Smith declares that Mackintosh

"Had waded through morasses of international law where the step of no living man could follow him."—Mackintosh's Life, vol. ii. chap. viii.

The Introductory Lecture, when published, elicited enthusiastic commendation:

"The effect produced by this publication surpassed our most sanguine hopes. It was received with unmixed applause by all parties, and most highly valued by those who were the best judges. The style was, in simplicity and elegance, a great improvement upon that of the 'Vindiciæ Gallicæ,' which bore too evident marks that the author had, in his early studies, been captivated by the vigour of Dr. Johnson. His more mature taste had relished the sweetness and delicacy of Addison and the richness of Burke. I am disposed to consider this essay as the most perfect of all his writings. The late Dr. Currie of Liverpool, himself a great example as well as great critic in the art of composition, in a letter to me on the subject of Mr. Mackintosh's literary attainments, expressed his opinion that this essay had placed him at the head of the writers of the present age. Everybody became anxious to hear the lectures which were announced with so much elegance, learning, and reverence for truth."—SIR JAMES SCARLETT, (LORD ABINGER.) Mackintosh's Life, vol. ii. chap. iv.

"If Mackintosh had published nothing else than his 'Discourse on the Law of Nature and Nations,' he would have left a perfect monument of his intellectual strength and symmetry; and, even supposing that that essay had been recovered only imperfect and mutilated, if but a score of its consecutive sentences could be shown, they would bear a testimony to his genius as decided as the bust of Theseus bears to Grecian art among the Elgin marbles."—THOMAS CAMPBELL: Mackintosh's Life, vol. i. chap. iii.

"I must be permitted to say," writes Wm. Pitt to the gratified author, "that I have never met with any thing so able and eloquent on the subject in any language."

"A lecture in the spirit of that discourse would at all times be of great utility, and of much ornament to the profession of the law. In times like the present it is capable of rendering great service to the cause of religion, morality, and civil policy."—LORD LOUGHBOROUGH.

"Perused, with delight and admiration, Mackintosh's Preliminary Discourse on the Study of the Law of Nature and Nations; exhibiting a most perspicuous and masterly view of this complicated subject, and imparting a most exalted idea of the future Temple to which it forms the Portico."—Green's Diary of a Lover of Lit., March 8th, 1799, Ipswich, 1810, 4to, 127.

"Everywhere about us are the mighty fragments of his genius, like the mutilated Torso, exhibiting in its broken proportions the exquisite skill of the artist. His Introductory Lecture on the Law of Nations, the most magnificent discourse in our own or perhaps in any other language, is but a finished portico for the vestibule of a temple destined never to be erected."—JUDGE STORY: Life and Letters, 1851, vol. i. 562.

See Judge Story's remarks on the Dissertation on Ethical Philosophy already quoted by us.

"How few," remarks the same eminent jurist, "have aspired, even in vision, after those comprehensive researches into the law of nations which the Introductory Discourse of Sir James Mackintosh has opened and explained with such attractive elegance and truth!"—Story's Miscell. Writings, 1852, 237. See also p. 239.

Again:

"Sir James Mackintosh, of late years so distinguished in Parliament as a friend to liberty, to science and liberal institutions, and who is at the same time a most humane and philosophical jurist, has in his incomparable Introductory Discourse to his Lectures on the Law of Nations given us a finished specimen of the advantages resulting from the mastery of foreign public writers. It would perhaps be difficult to select from the whole mass of modern literature a discourse of equal length which is so just and beautiful, so accurate and profound, so captivating and enlightening, so enriched with the refinements of modern learning and the simple grandeur of ancient principles. It should be read by every student for instruction and purity of sentiment, and by lawyers of graver years to refresh their souls with inquiries which may elevate them above the narrow influences of a dry and hardening practice."—Story's Review of Phillips's Treat. on the Law of Insurance: N. Amer. Rev., xx. 64–65, Jan. 1825.

It seems pertinent to remark here that Sir James's admiration of Judge Story's critical acumen and profound erudition is no secret:

"I wish," writes Sir James, in a letter to Mr. Everett, introducing some English friends, dated June 3, 1824. "that Mr. S—— and his friends could be made known to Mr. Justice Story, whom I have not the honour to know, but whose judgments are so justly admired by all cultivators of the Law of Nations." See Story's Life and Letters, vol. i. 435.

"The Introductory Lecture was published at the time, and is one of the most valuable and important of his printed works. We cannot doubt that the whole course will be brought before the world; and, if the other Lectures compare at all in merit with the first, the work must become at once the standard and text-book of the great sciences of Natural and National Law."—A. H. EVERETT: N. Amer. Rev., xxxv. 440.

Would that these Lectures had been given to the world! This great loss is but one added to innumerable others resulting from that common evil, procrastination. III. MACKINTOSH THE ESSAYIST.

Of Mackintosh's essays contributed to the Edinburgh Review, there will be found in his Miscellaneous Works, ed. 1854: Vol. I.: 1. The extracts entitled On the Philosophical Genius of Lord Bacon and Mr. Locke, taken from Edin. Rev., vols. xxvii. and xxxvi., (vide ante.) 2. A paper on the Authorship of the ΕΙΚΩΝ ΒΑΣΙΛΙΚΗ, from Edin. Rev., xlvi. 1, &c. Vol. II.: 3. An Account of the Partition of Poland, from Edin. Rev., xxxvii. 463, &c. 4. Sketch of the Administration and Fall of Struensee, from Edin. Rev., xliv. 366, &c. 5 Statement of the Claim of the Case of Donna Maria Da Gloria as a Claimant to the Crown of Portugal, from Edin. Rev., xlv. 202. 6. On the Writings of Machiavel, from Edin. Rev., xxvii. 207. 7. Review of Mr. Godwin's Lives of Edward and John Phillips, &c., from Edin. Rev., xxv. 485. 8. Review of Madame De Stael's 'De l'Allemagne,' from Edin. Rev., xxii. 198, &c. Vol. III.: 9. On the State of France in 1815, from Edin. Rev., xxiv. 518. 10. On the Right of Parliamentary Suffrage, from Edin. Rev., xxxi. 174. There is also in the third vol. a paper entitled Reasons against the French War of 1793, from the Month. Rev., xl. 435.

"He contributed," says Lord Jeffrey, "articles of great value to this journal."—Edin. Rev., lxii. 211.

"Sir James Mackintosh is understood to be a writer in the Edinburgh Review, and the articles attributed to him there are full of matter of great pith and moment. But they want the trim, pointed expression, the ambitious ornaments, the ostentatious display and rapid volubility, of his early productions."—Hazlitt's Spirit of the Age: Sir James Mackintosh, q. v.

"Sir James's admirable articles in the Edinburgh Review."—Rt. Hon. J. W. Croker: Lon. Quar. Rev., liv. 292.

"Mackintosh has been already discussed in these pages as a senator; but his merits as an essayist, and as one of the original contributors to the Edinburgh Review, are too considerable to render any apology necessary for again making him the subject of discussion. His mind was essentially philosophical; his soul was imbued with principle, his memory stored with knowledge. He was fitted to have been a great leader of men, rather than their powerful ruler. These characteristics are strongly apparent in his writings; and the English language cannot present a more perfect example of philosophical disquisition than some of his political essays, particularly that on Parliamentary Reform, exhibit."—Sir Archibald Alison: Hist. of Europe, 1815–1852, chap. v.

"His collected essays from the Edinburgh Review, lately put together, are not so discursive as those of Lord Jeffrey nor so amusing as those of Sydney Smith; but they are much more profound than either, and treat of subjects more permanently interesting to the human race. Many of them—particularly that on representative governments—abound with views equally just and original. It is impossible not to regret that a mind so richly stored with historical knowledge and so largely endowed with philosophic penetration should have left so few lasting monuments of its great and varied powers."—Sir Archibald Alison: Essays, Polit., Histor. and Miscell., 1850, iii. 635.

Allan Cunningham, after a review of the critical characteristics of Jeffrey, Gifford, Brougham, and Sydney Smith, remarks,

"Sir James Mackintosh was a critic of a milder mood: his knowledge reached from east to west; he was familiar with the history of our literature, and tasted the racy spirit of our earlier verse like a poet of the highest order. . . . But he inclined more to discussion than to criticism: he seldom embroiled himself in personal matters; he loved to speculate in magnificent generalities. . . . If he chanced to dip his wing in the stream of sarcastic criticism, he soon rose again into upper air."—Biog. and Crit. Hist. of the Lit. of the Last Fifty Years.

See also Tuckerman's Characteristics of Lit., Second Series, 1851, 220; Whipple's Essays and Reviews, 1851, ii. 114–117, (and in N. Amer. Rev., lxi. 483–485;) McCulloch's Lit. of Polit. Econ., 1845, 14. But among the very best of Mackintosh's essays are the admirable literary portraits which occur in the Memoirs of his Life, by his son, Robert James Mackintosh, Fellow of New College, Oxford, Lon., 1852, 2 vols. 8vo. These volumes were received with immediate favour from the public, and are not likely ever to lose their popularity:

"There cannot, we think, be a more delightful book than this,—whether we consider the attraction of the character it brings so pleasantly before us, or the infinite variety of original thoughts and fine observations with which it abounds. . . . By far the greater part of it is of Sir James's own writing; and it would perhaps have been more justly entitled 'Journals and Letters of Sir James Mackintosh, with a short Account of his Life.' When his works, accordingly, come to be collected, we have no doubt that most of what is now before us will go into the collection, and be read with delight and admiration, long after it has become a matter of indifference where he was born and educated,—what places he represented in Parliament,—what offices he filled or should have filled,—or with whom he most delighted to associate."—Lord Jeffrey: Edin. Rev., lxii. 205, 241; and in his lordship's Contrib. to Edin. Rev., 1853, 958.

We marvel that Lord Jeffrey's hint has not been taken ere this, and a transfer been made from the Memoirs to Mackintosh's works of much that surely would there be in its most appropriate place,—though, of course, we are glad to have it anywhere.

"No book has appeared for a long time," writes Sydney Smith to Sir Wilmot Horton in 1835, "more agreeable than the Life of Mackintosh: it is full of important judgments on important men, books, and things."—Memoir of Rev. Sydney Smith, vol. ii.

"Sydney, speaking of Mackintosh and his 'Memoirs,' remarked on the proof they afforded of his having been so very honest a politician."—Moore's Journal, &c., 1856, vii. 204.

"This is, though not a good Life of this eminent man, a most interesting and entertaining collection of Mackintoshiana."—Rt. Hon. J. W. Croker: Lon. Quar. Rev., liv. 250–294, q. v.

"In less than a fortnight, during this voyage, [Bombay to England,] he seems to have thrown off nearly twenty elaborate characters of eminent authors or statesmen in English story, conceived with a justness and executed with a delicacy which would seem unattainable without long meditation and patient revisal."—Lord Jeffrey: Edin Rev., lxii. 222; and Essays, 1853, 963.

"The characters of the poets and statesmen of England during the eighteenth century, written on the voyage home from Bombay and published in his very interesting Life by his son, are perhaps the most perfect criticisms and portraits of the kind in the English language."—Sir Archibald Alison: Essays, 1850, iii. 635.

See also his Hist. of England, 1815–1852, chap. v.; see also Sir Archibald's Hist. 1789–1815, chap. lx.

The pleasure with which we peruse the Memoirs of Mackintosh is certainly much alloyed by the consideration of how much more he could have done, and intended to do, than he actually effected for the education of the public mind.

"I well remember," remarks Mr. William W. Story, in his life of his father, "the interest with which he [Judge Story] read the elegant biography of that distinguished man by his son, commenting, with some impatience and much regret, on his want of decision and energy in carrying out his ideas and large designs."—Vol. ii. 563.

It will be remembered that Judge Story expatiates on this subject with great force and beauty in A Discourse (portions of which we have already quoted) on the Literary Tendencies of the Times, pronounced before the Society of the Alumni of Harvard University at their First Anniversary, Aug. 23, 1842. See Story's Miscell. Works, 1852, 761–763.

"What can be more melancholy," remarks the eloquent speaker, "than the contemplation of such a mind,—so comprehensive in learning, so elevated in virtues,—which has thus passed away leaving so many admirable enterprises unaccomplished and so many plans for immortality unfulfilled?"

This is a common source of regret; but it is not to be forgotten that Lord Jeffrey vigorously defends his late friend from this imputation:

"Before concluding," he remarks, in his review of Mackintosh's Memoirs, "we wish to say a word on a notion which we find pretty generally entertained,—that Sir James Mackintosh did not sufficiently turn to profit the talent which was committed to him, and did much less than, with his gifts and opportunities, he ought to have done. He himself seems, no doubt, to have been occasionally of that opinion; and yet we cannot but think it in a great degree erroneous. . . . We know of no code of morality which makes it imperative on every man of extraordinary talent to write a large book."

But the reader must refer to this valiant apology. See Edin. Rev., lxii. 248–255; and Jeffrey's Contrib. to Edin. Rev., 1853, 970–975. IV. Mackintosh the Historian.

Under this head we are to consider—1. The History of England, written for Lardner's Cabinet Cyclopædia. Vol. i. was pub. in 1830, vol. ii. in 1831. Of vol. iii. Sir James lived to complete only a portion,—to the fourteenth year of the reign of Elizabeth. The unfinished volume was handed to Mr. William Wallace, a literary barrister, for completion: he died before he had concluded his labours, and Mr. Robert Bell finished the work. The History of England has since been republished in 10 vols. 12mo; and in 1853, revised by the author's son, 2 vols. 8vo. Of course, our quotations apply only to that portion of the History for which Sir James is responsible.

"They bear marks both of talent and research; but there is nothing in them of that high and commanding order which makes common readers pause and say, A new light has arisen in the land. In truth, the genius of Mackintosh belonged less to history than oratory."—Allan Cunningham: Biog. and Crit. Hist., &c.

"Received from Dr. Lardner some of the sheets (about half a volume) of Mackintosh's 'History of England:' read them with much avidity, and was, on the whole, not disappointed,—which, taking into account the expectation with which one must always approach any thing of Mackintosh's, is saying a great deal."—Moore's Journal, &c., 1853, vi. 108.

"He was a great essayist or painter of character rather than a great historian. His History of England—written for Lardner's Encyclopedia—can scarcely be called a history: it is rather a series of discourses on History. It treats so largely of some events, so scantily of others, that a reader not previously acquainted with the subject might rise from its perusal with scarcely an idea of the thread of English story. But no one who was already informed on it can do so without feeling his mind stored with original and valuable reflection, just and profound views."—Sir Archibald Alison: Essays, 1850, iii. 635. See also p. 427.

"After dreaming all his life about a philosophical History of England, he, in his very last years, lowered his ambition to the humble task of preparing an abridgment for Lardner's Encyclopedia, in which he did not wholly discard the philosophical style of writing history, and frequently suspends his narrative to make sometimes profound, but more often trivial, observations, which Hume used to condense into a single epithet. But even this abridgment he brought down only to the Reformation [vide ante]."—Rt. Hon. J. W. Croker: Lon. Quar. Rev., liv. 294.

"There is little pretension in the appearance of these volumes. Do not be deceived by this circumstance: they are full of weighty matter, and are everywhere marked by paragraphs of comprehensive thought and sound philosophy, political and moral. They are very well worthy their distinguished author. The sentences are now and then overcharged with reflection, so as to become obscure, particularly in the first volume. But do not be deterred by a fault that too naturally resulted from the richly-stored and highly metaphysical mind of this valuable writer."—Prof. Smyth's Lects. on Mod. Hist., Lect. V. See also Lect. VIII., and notes to Lects. V., VI.

"In the first volume we find enough to warrant the anticipations of the public that a calm and luminous philosophy will diffuse itself over the long narration of our British story. But we must expect the full display of that eminent writer's powers in the ensuing volumes."—Dr. John Allen: Edin. Rev., liii. 17.

"I think the history a noble one: perhaps I never read one with equal gratification. He knows on what parts of history to throw the strongest light: he judges past ages with discrimination and candour, enters into their spirit, and knows the significance of actions in different stages of society. A genuine sympathy with the human race, and a high moral feeling, breathe through the work. He is a thorough Englishman, yet interested in the cause of mankind; and a staunch friend of liberty, without going into the extravagance of liberalism. It does one good to see a man so conversant with the world and with history holding fast his confidence in the trials and triumphs of truth, freedom, and virtue. A man may know the world, it seems, without despairing of it."—Dr. W. E. Channing: Mackintosh's Life, vol. ii. chap. vii.

"It is an excellent summary of the most memorable events in English history, and contains a sound and philosophical view of the nature and progress of her social and political institutes, written in a chaste and elegant style."—Chancellor Kent: Course of Eng. Reading, Oakley's ed., 1853, 22.

We have now to consider—

2. Review of the Causes of the Revolution of 1688.

The nine chapters (pp. 1–336, vol. ii., of Mackintosh's Miscell. Works, ed. 1854) which compose this fragment comprise all that was completed of the author's twenty years' dream of a philosophical history of England. These chapters, (sold for £500,) with a Continuation by another hand, and a Selection of the Speeches of Sir James Mackintosh, were pub. in a large 4to vol. (above 900 pages) in 1834, £3 30*s.*; subsequently reduced to £1 11*s.* 6*d.* Great expectations had been long entertained of Mackintosh's prospective History of England, —"a work," says Campbell, "which he meant to have been his monument for posterity."

"For nearly twenty years," writes Allan Cunningham in 1833, "his History was in hand; and yet I know not that a single volume was finished. . . . When any one inquired what he was about, they were told he was collecting materials and digging the foundations of his future structure. One saw him taking notes from the manuscripts in the British Museum; by another he was found consulting the records of the Commons, or the documents in the State-Paper Office; while by a third he was overheard in consultation with Lord Holland on the meaning of some dubious deed or dark undertaking in the days of William or Anne."—Biog. and Crit. Hist., &c.

"The history of the same period," writes Dr. John Allen in 1831, "which we hope to obtain from the pen of Sir James Mackintosh, will send Smollett to the cheesemongers."—Edin. Rev., liii. 17.

But we can give nothing so much to the point as the author's own appeal to the public for original materials to be used in the compilation of his projected History. We print from an original copy of the "Advertisement," which we have preserved in our "Mackintosh Collections."

"History of Great Britain, from the Revolution in 1688, to the French Revolution in 1789: by Sir James Mackintosh, M.P., LL.D., F.R.S.

"It is the wish of the author that this work may not exceed three volumes in quarto, but it may extend to four. He has already experienced a facility of access to original papers greater than even with his confidence in the liberality of the age and nation, he could have ventured to hope. But there are, doubtless, many proprietors of valuable papers to whom he has not the good fortune to be known, or of whose collections he has not heard. They are likely to be as desirous as any others to contribute towards an authentic history of their country. Trusting in their liberal character, the author ventures in this manner respectfully to solicit information, through his publishers, concerning the Historical Papers in their possession, and to request access to their collections in the manner and on the conditions which they may think fit," &c.

This appeal was liberally responded to:

"The reason of my having been at the levee," writes Sir James in 1813, "was to thank the Prince for having granted me access to a very valuable collection of papers which he has lately procured. They are those of the Stuart family. . . . I go to the library at Carlton House four hours of three days in the week to make extracts from them."—Mackintosh's Life, vol. ii. chap. iv.

"Much of his time [in 1815] was also occupied in what was still but a preliminary labour,—that of arranging and adding to the richness of manuscript materials which had been placed at his disposal. The kind consideration with which his late majesty had conceded access to the papers of the House of Stuart has been mentioned,—an example which was followed by the representatives of most of the noble families which supplied the actors in the historical scenes upon which he was engaged, with a liberality which commanded his grateful acknowledgments. It may give an idea of the anxiety of his preparations for a faithful narrative, to state that his collection of MS. authorities amounted to fifty volumes. Such it now remains,—serving, at least, to mark the broad and deep foundations from which only the majestic proportions of the intended superstructure can now be ascertained."—Mackintosh's Life, vol. ii. chap. v.

In our life of Thomas Baker, p. 104 of this Dictionary, we have quoted some remarks so pertinent to our present subject that we venture to commend them to the reader's attention:

"We shall probably lose the great work," says Professor Smyth to his class at Cambridge, "which Sir James projected as a continuation of Hume. This, on every account, is forever to be lamented: no one ever had access to such materials or was so fitted to use them."—Notes to Lects. V., VI. on Mod. Hist.

Neither of these remarks can now be repeated. Mr. Macaulay has added the collections of his predecessor to the vast materials accumulated by his own untiring industry, and has already chronicled a portion of the History of England in a manner to which neither Sir James Mackintosh nor any writer of the day could make even a distant approach.

"I take this opportunity," writes Mr. Macaulay, "of expressing my warm gratitude to the family of my dear and honoured friend, Sir James Mackintosh, for confiding to me the materials collected by him at a time when he meditated a work similar to that which I have undertaken. I have never seen, and I do not believe that there anywhere exists, within the same compass, so noble a collection of extracts from public and private archives. The judgment with which Sir James, in great masses of the rudest ore of history, selected what was valuable and rejected what was worthless, can be fully appreciated only by one who has toiled after him in the same mine."—Macaulay's Hist. of Eng., vol. i. chap. iii., n.

But how has Sir James accomplished the fragment which he completed? For an answer to this question the reader must consult the authorities from which our limited space allows us to make but brief extracts. Mr. Macaulay was quoted last as to the preparation, and he shall be the first heard respecting the results:

"The intellectual and moral qualities which are most important in a historian he possessed in a very high degree. He was singularly mild, calm, and impartial in his judgments of men and of parties. Almost all the distinguished writers who have treated of English history are advocates. Mr. Hallam and Sir James Mackintosh alone are entitled to be called judges. . . . We have no hesitation in pronouncing this Fragment decidedly the best history now extant of the reign of James the Second. . . . We find in it the diligence, the accuracy, and the judgment of Hallam united to the vivacity and the colouring of Southey. A history of England written throughout in this manner would be the most fascinating book in the language. It would be more in request at the circulating-libraries than the last novel."—Edin. Rev., lxi. 270, 271; and in Macaulay's Essays, 1854, ii. 59, 60, 61.

"We shall not resume what we have said, in another place, as to the merit of the histories which are now in question; but we fear not to put this upon record as our deliberate, and, we think, impartial, judgment,—that they are the most candid, the most judicious, and the most pregnant with thought and moral and political wisdom, of any in which our domestic story has ever yet been recorded."—Lord Jeffrey: Edin. Rev., lxii. 251; and in Jeffrey's Contrib. to Edin. Rev., 1853, 972.

His lordship also remarks, in a letter to the historian's son, that Sir James's "historical writings will probably be the most durable monuments of his merits;" and that he knows

"No writer who has so successfully recalled History to her proper vocation of a teacher."—Mackintosh's Life, vol. ii. chap. viii.

"This lecture was written many years ago; but at this moment, while I am now reading it, occurs the great subject of regret to literary men, and particularly those interested in the history of their country,—the loss of Sir James Mackintosh. This great thinker and accomplished writer was worthy of such a theme, and had undertaken it: what he has left is the best account we have of the first ominous proceedings of the reign of James the Second."—Prof. Smyth's Lects. on Mod. Hist., Lect. XXIII.

"He left a few chapters of a History of the Revolution of 1688, (which we noticed in a former number;) but this, notwithstanding all that we hear of his diligence in seeking for information, contains, we believe, nothing new, and might, we think, be more truly called an attempt to reconcile the principles of the Whigs of 1830 with those of 1688."—J. W. Croker: Lon. Quar. Rev., liv. 292.

"It contains much new and curious information, of which excellent use has been made."—Edin. Rev., lxi. 270.

"Mackintosh . . . wanted only greater industry, and a happy exemption from London society, to have rivalled Thucydides in the depth of his views."—Sir Archibald Alison: Hist. of Europe, 1789–1815, chap. lx., 1839, &c.

"It is deeply to be regretted that Sir James Mackintosh did not complete his long-cherished design of continuing Hume's history. No man since Hume's time possessed so many qualifications for the undertaking. To an incomparable talent for depicting character, and a luminous, philosophic mind, he joined great erudition, extensive knowledge, and a practical acquaintance both with statesmen and ordinary life."—Ibid.: Essays, 1850, iii. 323; from Blackw. Mag., March, 1845.

The contrast between these opinions and the verdict of the same critic recorded on a different occasion is rather striking:

"He never could have carried on, in a style of equal popularity, the immortal work of Hume; and the absorption of his mind and waste of his time in the abstractions of London society—so much a subject of regret at the time to his friends—perhaps saved his reputation from the injury it must have sustained had he aimed at a higher flight and failed in the attempt."—Ibid.: Hist. of Europe, 1815–1852, chap. v., pub. 1852.

"The beginning of the history which he has left . . . is learned, minute, and elaborate, but dull."—Ibid.: Essays, 1850, iii. 634; from Blackw. Mog., April, 1849.

"His contributions to the History of England seem but interludes between the acts and epochs of that great drama, where the curtain drops just when the principal actors are about to play their parts on that grand theatre of human life."—JUDGE STORY: Life, 1851, ii. 562; and Miscell. Writings, 1852, 762.

Allan Cunningham published the following opinion before the appearance of Sir James's fragment: his expectations evidently were not of the most sanguine character:

"He seemed to want that scientific power of combination without which the brightest materials of history are but as a glittering mass: he was deficient in that patient but vigorous spirit which broods over scattered and unconnected things and brings them into order and beauty. . . . A clear, straightforward, consistent narrative, such as history demands, was a flight beyond him."—Biog. and Crit. Hist., &c.

With the Continuation of Sir James's History, and the Memoir prefixed to it, Mr. Macaulay—certainly a competent witness—does not seem particularly gratified:

"The Continuation which follows Sir James Mackintosh's Fragment is as offensive as the Memoir which precedes it. We do not pretend to have read the whole, or even one-half of it. Three hundred quarto pages of such matter are too much for human patience. . . . Why such an artist was selected to deface so fine a Torso we cannot pretend to conjecture."—Edin. Rev., lxi. 272, 278.

See Macaulay's Crit. and Hist. Essays, 1854, ii. 52–127. Especially see note at bottom of p. 52. See also Lon. Quar. Rev., l. 273; N. Amer. Rev., lxvi. 274–276; Warren's Law Studies, 1845, 400; Westm. Rev., xxi. 399; Lon. Month. Rev., cxxii. 546, cxxv. 187; Bost. Chris. Exam., xi. 377, (by S. A. Eliot.)

The Life of Sir Thomas More, pub. in Lardner's Cabinet Cyclopædia, (new ed., 1844, fp. 8vo,) arose out of the investigations made by Sir James when engaged in the preparation of the history of the reign of Henry VIII., and may therefore be properly classed with his historical writings. It has been described as "One of the most pleasing and instructive pieces of biography in the English language. More's talents, his knowledge, his wit, his superiority, his age, his pure life, his unspotted mind, his unaffected homely virtue and warm affections, are described with all the feelings of affectionate admiration. There are probably few works in which the moral ends of biography are better answered, or from which the reader is likely to rise more pleased and improved."—Mackintosh's Life, vol. ii. chap. vii.

"It is very consoling to think that Sir James has been able to rescue the fame of More from any charge of positive cruelty, and even from materially forgetting the sentiments of mercy and justice which nature and reflection had implanted in his bosom."—Prof. Smyth's Lects. on Mod. Hist., Lect. X.

See note of the American editor, (Jared Sparks, LL.D.,) p. 166 of Amer. ed., Bost., 1851.

"We have also, of his, a Life of Sir Thomas More, which is really such turtle-soup as we have before described, where the facts of the old biographies float about in a tureen of Mackintosh: the gravy, we admit, is well made, and, on the whole, it is very palatable. We, however, are of Sir William Curtis's school, and still prefer what he used to call the turtle dressed clean."—J. W. CROKER: Lon. Quar. Rev., liv. 292.

Dr. A. P. Peabody gives a very different verdict from this, and commends the author for keeping himself in the background, forbearing all irrelevant rhetoric and impertinent discussion, and concealing the "painter's hand." See N. Amer. Rev., lxvi. 272.

"Sir James Mackintosh, in his elegant Life of Sir Thomas More, has sketched out a history of Chancery Jurisdiction not materially different from that given by Lord Hardwicke, aided as he was by late discoveries of the Commissioners of the Public Records, as stated in their printed reports."—Judge Story's Equity Jurisp., 6th ed., 1853, i. 45, n.

Several of the articles on historical subjects contributed to the Edinburgh Review might claim a notice here; but some of these have already been named in a preceding division with other essays. In addition to the articles there enumerated, his Miscellaneous Works contain—ed. of 1854: Vol. I. Dissertation on Ethical Philosophy; A Discourse on the Law of Nature and Nations; Life of Sir Thomas More; Memoir of the Affairs of Holland. Vol. II. Review of the Causes of the Revolution of 1688; Character of Charles, First Marquis of Cornwallis; Character of the Rt. Hon. George Canning; Preface to a Reprint of the Edinburgh Review of 1755; Review of Rogers's Poems; Discourse read at the Opening of the Literary Society of Bombay. Vol. III. Vindiciæ Gallicæ Speech in defence of Jean Peltier, accused of a Libel on the First Consul of France; a Charge at Bombay; Seven Speeches in the House of Commons, 1815, '19, '24, 28, '29, '31. Sir James's Miscellaneous Works were first pub. in 1846, 3 vols. 8vo; 2d ed., 1851, sq. cr. 8vo; 3d ed., 1854, 3 vols. 12mo. See De Quincey's Essays on Philosophical Writers, &c., Bost., 1854, i. 64–95.

V. MACKINTOSH THE ORATOR.

It requires little temerity to hazard the remark that Mackintosh the parliamentary speaker never equalled Mackintosh the advocate of Jean Peltier. The expectations of the public were high when the celebrated pleader took his seat in the House of Commons: he soon gave notice of a motion on the cession of Norway to Sweden:

"The crush was great to hear him, and the dread of the ministry was not a little, for the fame of his knowledge and eloquence was high."

He made a learned speech, a philosophical speech, but not one of the kind that carries the hearer away with the speaker whether he will or not:

"I heard many members mutter, 'A complete failure,' when he concluded his speech."—ALLAN CUNNINGHAM: Biog. and Crit. Hist., &c.

"We could easily name men who, not possessing a tenth part of his intellectual powers, hardly ever address the House of Commons without producing a greater impression than was produced by his most splendid and elaborate orations. His luminous and philosophical disquisition on the Reform Bill was spoken to empty benches. . . . His talents were not those which enable a speaker to produce with rapidity a series of striking but transitory impressions,—to excite the minds of five hundred gentlemen at midnight, without saying any thing that any one of them will be able to remember in the morning."—T. B. MACAULAY: Edin. Rev., lxi. 268–269; and in his Essays, 1854, ii. 57, 58.

"Sir James Mackintosh is an accomplished debater rather than a powerful orator. . . . His mode of treating a question is critical, and not parliamentary. It has been formed in the closet and the schools, and is hardly fitted for scenes of active life or the collisions of party spirit."—Hazlitt's Spirit of the Age: Sir James Mackintosh.

"Talked [with Lord John Russell] of Mackintosh's want of observation in common life, and his helplessness in the House of Commons from that circumstance."—Tom Moore's Memoirs, &c., 1853, iii. 177.

"His manner of speaking in Parliament was too elaborate, perhaps too didactic, and his voice harsh and hoarse."—LORD JOHN RUSSELL: Tom Moore's Memoirs, &c., 1853, vi., xii.

"His style of speaking in Parliament was certainly more academic than forensic: it was not sufficiently short and quick for a busy and impatient assembly. . . . His voice was bad and nasal; and, though nobody was in reality more sincere, he seemed not only not to feel, but hardly to think, what he was saying."—REV. SYDNEY SMITH: Mackintosh's Life, vol. ii. chap. viii.; and in Smith's Works, 1854, iii. 436.

"He soon took a leading part in the debates of the House of Commons; and it is enough to say that he lost nothing of his reputation by his performances there. If, however, I may be allowed to express an opinion on that subject, I should say that the House of Commons was not the theatre where the happiest efforts of his eloquence could either be made or appreciated. . . . It cannot be denied that, whenever the nature of the subject and the disposition of the House were favourable to his qualities as a speaker, he exhibited specimens of eloquence that were of the highest order and elicited the most unqualified applause."—SIR JAMES SCARLETT, (LORD ABINGER:) Life of Mackintosh, vol. ii. chap. iv.

"We must say that we think Lord Abinger's friendly partiality carried him too far when he characterized any of Mackintosh's efforts in Parliament as being of 'the highest order of eloquence. . . . Mr. Sydney Smith's testimony is more precise, and, we think, nearer the mark. . . . But, after all, the truest test of Mackintosh's parliamentary success—or, as he himself modestly called it, his failure—is the opinion not only of the House of Commons and the country, but of his party themselves."—J. W. CROKER: Lon. Quar. Rev., liv. 279, 281, q. v.

VI. MACKINTOSH THE CONVERSATIONIST.

If Sir James did not distinguish himself by public eloquence, he made ample amends by those wonderful conversational powers to which the present century has furnished no parallel. Dr. Johnson and Sir James Mackintosh were unquestionably the two greatest talkers of whom English annals present any record. Coleridge was a preacher, Burke a preceptor, Lamb a punster, Hook an epigrammatist, Sydney Smith a wit, and Charles Mathews a wag; but Johnson and Mackintosh were talkers. We regret that our limited space prevents our doing full justice to Mackintosh's remarkable colloquial talents; but some testimonies must be adduced:

"Till subdued by age and illness, his conversation was more brilliant and instructive than that of any human being I ever had the good fortune to be acquainted with. His memory (vast and prodigious as it was) he so managed as to make it a source of pleasure and instruction, rather than that dreadful engine of colloquial oppression into which it is sometimes erected. He remembered things, words, thoughts, dates, and every thing that was wanted. His language was beautiful, and might have gone from the fireside to the press."—Rev. Sydney Smith: Mackintosh's Life, vol. ii. chap. viii.; and Smith's Works, 1854, iii. 434.

"Of all those whose conversation is referred to by Moore, Sir James Mackintosh was the ablest, the most brilliant, and the best-informed. . . . His stores of learning were vast, and of those kinds, which, both in serious and light conversation, are most available. . . . This information, too, which no book or number of books of reference would have given, was conveyed in the easy language of conversation, and with the unassuming tone of an equal and a companion. Indeed, his mind seemed to comprehend in distinct but harmonious method the whole history of human thought, from the earliest speculations of the friends of Job to the latest subtleties of the disciples of Kant. . . . Thus endowed, conversation was his favourite employment and his chief seduction."—Lord John Russell: Pref. to Tom Moore's Memoirs, 1853, vi., xi., xii.

"November 11, 1829.—Mackintosh, as usual, delightful; his range of knowledge and memory so extensive, passing (as Greville remarked) from Voltaire's verses to Sylvia up to the most voluminous details of the Council of Trent."—Tom Moore's Memoirs, &c., 1853, vi. 90.

"October 9, 1832.—[Rogers] spoke of poor Mackintosh, [lately deceased:] said he had sacrificed himself to conversation; that he read for it, thought for it, and gave up future fame for it."—Ibid., 292.

"I never met with any person whose conversation was at once so delightful and so instructive. He possesses a vast quantity of well-arranged knowledge, grace and facility of expression, and gentle and obliging manners. It would be hard to find another person, of equal talents and acquirements so perfectly unassuming, or one so ready to talk whose conversation was so well worth listening to. Pride, reserve, laziness, and that mortal dread of being thought bores, or pedants, which haunts our English society, continually prevent the ablest and best-informed people from conversing in a satisfactory way upon the subjects upon which they are best acquainted. Now, Mackintosh, though nothing can be less like a pedant or a bore, has no prudery of that sort, but is always ready to discuss, to communicate, and to explain."—Mr. Ward, (Earl of Dudley:) Mackintosh's Life. vol. ii. chap. iv.

"The charms of his conversation, the pleasure and the instruction which were found in his society, can be appreciated by contemporaries only, who enjoyed the opportunity of intercourse with him. . . . In the more unmixed circles of his society, almost every subject of letters and metaphysics was freely discussed; and in every discussion Mr. Mackintosh bore an eminent part, not only for knowledge and acuteness, but for a spirit of candour and a love of truth which were ever with him paramount to the desire of victory."—Sir James Scarlett, (Lord Abinger:) Mackintosh's Life, vol. ii. chap. iv.

"In all his productions the riches of his knowledge and the subtlety and force of his understanding are alike conspicuous; but I am not sure whether his characteristic qualities did not display themselves in a more striking way in his conversation. It was here, at least, that his astonishing memory—astonishing equally for its extent, exactness, and promptitude—made the greatest impression."—Lord Jeffrey: Mackintosh's Life, vol. ii. chap. viii.

See also Lord Jeffrey's comments on the same subject in Edin. Rev., lxii. 212–213, and his Contrib. to Edin. Rev., 1853, 961. His lordship very properly rebukes (Edin. Rev., lxii. 242–248, and Contrib. to Edin. Rev., 967–970) Coleridge's affected contempt for Mackintosh's intellectual abilities. The reader may remember Hazlitt's comparison between the colloquial talent of Mackintosh and Coleridge: we quote a few lines:

"They have nearly an equal range of reading and of topics of conversation: but in the mind of the one we see nothing but fixtures; in the other every thing is fluid. The ideas of the one are as formal and tangible as those of the other are shadowy and evanescent. Sir James Mackintosh walks over the ground; Mr. Coleridge is always flying off from it. The first knows all that has been said upon a subject; the last has something to say that was never said before. . . . The conversation of Sir James Mackintosh has the effect of reading a well-written book; that of his friend is like hearing a bewildering dream. The one is an Encyclopedia of knowledge; the other is a succession of Sibylline Leaves."—The Spirit of the Age: Sir James Mackintosh.

As we have entered upon comparisons, it will be interesting to see a comparison drawn between the conversational powers of Jeffrey and Mackintosh. Sir Archibald Alison shall be the Plutarch:

"The writer once spent a forenoon in his society, from breakfast to two o'clock. Lord Jeffrey and Mr. Earle Monteith, now Sheriff of Fife, were the only other persons present. The superiority of Sir James Mackintosh to Jeffrey in conversation was then very manifest. His ideas succeeded each other much more rapidly; his expressions were more brief and terse, his repartee most felicitous. Jeffrey's great talent consisted in amplification and illustration, and there he was eminently great; and he had been accustomed to Edinburgh society, where he had been allowed by his admiring auditors, male and female, to prelect and expand ad libitum. Sir James had not greater quickness of mind,—for nothing could exceed Jeffrey in that respect,—but much greater power of condensed expression, and infinitely more rapidity in changing the subject of conversation. 'Tout toucher, rien approfondir' was his practice, as it is of all men in whom the real conversational talent exists, and where it has been trained to perfection by frequent collision, in polished society, with equal or superior men and elegant and charming women. Jeffrey, in conversation, was like a skilful swordsman flourishing his weapon in the air; while Mackintosh, with a thin, sharp rapier, in the middle of his evolutions, ran him through the body."—Hist. of Europe, 1815–1852.

Sir Archibald tells us in another place that Mackintosh only wanted

"A biographer like Boswell to have equalled Johnson in the fame of his conversation."—Hist. of Europe, 1789–1815, chap. lx.

The reader must not omit to refer to a contrast from the pen of Lord John Russell between the conversational characteristics of Mackintosh and Sydney Smith, in his lordship's Pref. to vol. vi. (1853) of Moore's Memoirs, xii.–xiv.

"The words which he casually uttered in conversation were remembered to be repeated. . . . He was a sayer of splendid things."—Allan Cunningham's Biog. and Crit. Hist., &c.

"A metaphysical argument might have been printed from the mouth of Sir J. Mackintosh, unaltered and complete. That arrangement of the parts of an abstruse subject which to others would be a laborious art was to him a natural suggestion and pleasurable exercise. In no instance have I seen an equal power of distributing methodically a long train of argument, adhering to his scheme, and completing it in all its parts. He divided his subject & command it."—Sir Henry Holland: Mackintosh's Life, [illegible] chap. vii.

"Whatever was valuable in the compositions of Sir James Mackintosh was the ripe fruit of study and of meditation. It was the same with his conversation. In his most familiar talk there was no wildness, no inconsistency, no amusing nonsense, no exaggeration for the sake of momentary effect. His mind was a vast magazine admirably arranged: every thing was there, and every thing was in its place. His judgments on men, on sects, on books, had been often and carefully tested and weighed, and had then been committed each to its proper receptacle in the most capacious and accurately-constructed memory that any human being ever possessed. It would have been strange, indeed, if you had asked for any thing that was not to be found in that immense warehouse. . . . You never saw his opinions in the making,—still rude, still inconsistent, and requiring to be fashioned by thought and discussion. They came forth, like the pillars of that temple in which no sound of axes or hammers was heard, finished, rounded, and exactly suited to their places."—Lord Macaulay: Edin. Rev., lxi. 269; and in his Essays, 1854, ii. 58, 59.

"His memory," remarks another admirer, who had ample proof whereof he affirmed, "is the most apt and prodigious I ever knew: indeed, one can hardly fancy a greater power of instant recollection and exact quotation."—Portfolio of a Man of the World, 1818: Lon. Gent. Mag., 1845, Pt. 2, 339.

If the reader desire to see a specimen of Sir James's "power of instant recollection and exact quotation," let him refer to a conversation between the "Man of the World," Mackintosh, and others, recorded in Lon. Gent. Mag., 1846, Pt. 1, 585–590.

After listening to copious quotations from Sir James in German, French, and English, the Man of the World bends his steps homeward, lost in wonder at the exhibition he had witnessed, and, after examining his books to verify the quotations, thus registers the result of his investigations:

"Looked in Browne, &c., when I got home, for all the quotations Sir James had made: properties for proprieties in Sir Thomas Browne: 'draw from heaven,' instead of 'pull,' in Jane Shore; and a few words left out in Lord Grenville's preface: but all the rest, as far as I can remember, was, word for word, quoted exactly."—P. 590.

See also Lon. Gent. Mag., 1845, Pt. 2, 339; 1846, Pt. 2, 563.

No wonder that Horne Tooke declared that Sir James "was a very formidable adversary across a table."

Another interesting specimen of his colloquial powers is recorded by the late Alexander H. Everett in the North American Review for October, 1832, (xxxv. 445–449.) It is thus prefaced:

"The writer of this article had the honor of a personal introduction to Sir James Mackintosh while on a visit to London in the year 1817, and, during that and some other subsequent visits, enjoyed a good deal of his society. He was much struck with the copiousness, elegance, originality, and point of Sir James's conversation, and made a memorandum, at the time, of a few of his remarks, which, with some omissions, is here recorded."—445, n.

"Mr. Sydney Smith says, forcibly, and with more justice than forcible sayings usually have had, 'the gall-bladder was omitted in his composition;' and certainly never was there a party-man a more acceptable member of general society:

> 'He steer'd through life with politics refined,
> With Pulteney voted, and with Walpole dined.'

"Of such men conversation is naturally the forte; and Mackintosh's was very delightful. If he had had a Boswell, we should have said of him what Burke said to him of Johnson.—that 'he was greater in Boswell's work than in his own.'"—J. W. Croker: Lon. Quar. Rev., liv. 289.

Sir Archibald Alison refers (Essays, 1850, iii. 634) to Sir James's habit of "spending whole forenoons in conversing with fashionable or literary ladies" whilst his prospective History of England was claiming his time in his library. The ladies were not ungrateful for the preference:

"His prodigious memory," says Mrs. Thomson, "was so chastised by judgment as never to overpower. He needed not the foil of ordinary minds to set off his mental superiority. Among the select of France and England, by the side of Hallam and Sismondi, he surpassed all other minds in the extent of his knowledge and freshness of ideas. With Cuvier and Herschel, the accomplished philosopher, great in science almost as in literature, shone forth; in conversational tact, and in that quiet repartee which, uttered by his lips, was pointed but never caustic, he could cope with Jeffrey."—Mrs. Thomson's Recollections of Literary Characters, &c., 1854, ii. 63.

But of Sir James's literary admirers in England, France, and Germany—and their name was legion—no one was more enthusiastic than Madame de Stäel, who seems to have deemed his conversational eloquence but one degree short of inspiration:

"She looked for his colloquial powers wherever she went, and had almost persuaded herself that his presence was indispensable to her complete enjoyment of society in England. 'Je ne puis trop vous dire à quel point j'ai besoin de vous partout, et plus encore dans cette belle Isle où je sens si fort le manque des souvenirs. Pour vous il me semble que, si je vous retrouvois, tant j'ai la fierté de penser que nos pensées et nos sentiments sont d'accord.' Speaking of a dinner where she had not met him, she said, 'Nous avons diné chez Ward, mais vous y brilliez comme les images de Brutus et Cassius: il n'y a pas de société ici sans vous. Ce n'est pas que Ward n'ait été aimable tout-à-fait; mais il prêchoit un peu dans le dessert.' And, on another similar occasion, 'C'est très-ennuyeux de diner sans vous, (he was going to the country,) et la société ne va pas quand vous n'êtes pas là. J'ai pourtant aujourd'hui Sheridan; mais en Anglois je n'ai que des idées et point de mots.' Even at Paris she would write, 'Rien de pareil à vous existe ici.' Such were not the passing feelings of the day; and towards the close of her life, when no ideas save those that partake of the lofty and the durable—such as were likely to have been associated with the remembrance of her friend—readily present themselves, she wrote to him, 'Rien n'est changé dans mes sentimens pour tout ce qui m'est cher: je vous prie de vous y comprendre au premier rang,—comme en toutes choses vous êtes au premier rang.'"—Mackintosh's Life, vol. ii. chap. iv.

In speaking of him to others this accomplished woman was equally enthusiastic:

"Do you know Mackintosh?" inquired Lord Byron of the Countess of Blessington. "His is a mind of powerful calibre. Madame de Stäel used to extol him to the skies, and was perfectly sincere in her admiration of him,—which was not the case with all whom she praised. Mackintosh also praised her; but his is a mind that, as Moore writes, 'rather loves to praise than blame;' for, with a judgment so comprehensive, a knowledge so general, and a critical acumen rarely to be met with, his sentences are never severe. He is a powerful writer and speaker: there is an earnestness and vigour in his style, and a force and purity in his language, equally free from inflation and loquacity."—Countess of Blessington's Conversations with Lord Byron.

On another occasion Byron characterizes Mackintosh as

"So mighty and so gentle too."

Again, in his Diary in 1813, he registers the receipt of "a very handsome note from Mackintosh, who is a rare instance of the union of very transcendent talent and great good nature," and, in the same year, thus responds to an invitation from the object of such enthusiastic admiration:

"Dear Sir James:

"I was to have left London on Friday, but will certainly remain a day longer (and believe I would a year) to have the honour of meeting you."

A few months since, when listening with great pleasure at "Sunnyside" (the romantic residence of the author of The Sketch-Book) to Mr. Washington Irving's reminiscences of some of the eminent characters with whom he had associated in the early part of the present century, we asked him if the conversational powers of Sir. James Mackintosh appeared to him so remarkable as they were generally represented. He replied in the affirmative. To a subsequent request that he would favour us with some written recollections of Sir James, we received the following response:

"Sunnyside, Sept. 7th, 1857.

"My Dear Sir:

"I regret that I can furnish you with nothing worthy of record with regard to Sir James Mackintosh. It is now nearly thirty years since I enjoyed an intercourse with him; and, though I well remember the engaging charms of his kind and genial manners and the delights of his conversation, my treacherous memory retains nothing but general impressions.

"With great regard,
"Yours, very truly,
"Washington Irving.

"S. Austin Allibone, Esq."

A similar request addressed to Mr. Edward Everett elicited the following:

"Medford, Mass., 28 August, 1857.

"Dear Sir:

"I have yours of the 25th: the following slight reminiscences will perhaps answer your purpose:

"On one occasion I was alone with Sir James Mackintosh, for some time, in the library of Holland House, when the conversation turned principally on Burke's oratory, I asked him whether his recollection confirmed the tradition that it sometimes emptied the seats in the House of Commons. Sir James said it certainly did at times, especially after the rupture with Fox. A volume of Burke lay on the table; and, in a pause of the conversation, Sir James took it up and read the famous passage about common language and kindred blood, in the speech on Conciliation with America. He read in an animated but somewhat formal and monotonous manner. When he had finished the passage, I asked him whether words like those ever emptied the seats of the British House of Commons. He brought his hand violently to his thigh and said, 'It is impossible.'

"Sir James, as is well known, gave offence to some of his political friends by what they unjustly deemed his apostasy from liberal principles. The following amusing anecdote is occasionally repeated in London. I heard it told at a dinner-party, by the late Bishop of London, (Dr. Blomfield,) who, in telling it, imitated Dr Parr's lisp. After the Irish Rebellion, Sir James, at a dinner where Dr. Parr also was present, alluding to one of the victims, [Quigley,] said 'he was the worst of men.' Dr. Parr paused a moment, to construct a sentence, and then said, 'No, Sir James; he was a very bad man, but he was not "the worst of men." He was an Irishman; he might have been a Scotchman: he was a priest; he might have been a lawyer: he was a traitor; Sir James, he might have been an apostate:'—the latter part of the sentence being spoken with a fixed look at Sir James.

"I am, dear sir, with much regard,
"Sincerely, yours,
"Edward Everett

"S. Austin Allibone, Esq."

VII. Mackintosh's Moral and Intellectual Characteristics.

"His merit and his pretensions," says Lord Abinger, "have placed him—and will maintain him with posterity—in a position far above those who were engaged in the petty strife of party and the contentions for power. His genius and his talents will shed a lustre over the age in which he lived when his more fortunate competitors are forgotten. As an elegant writer, a consummate master of metaphysics and moral philosophy,—as a profound historian,—as an accomplished orator,—he will be known to all future times. . . . The highest praise of Sir James Mackintosh is that he was, by disposition and nature, the advocate of truth. . . . No man ever lived more in society, or shone more in conversation; yet it would be difficult—I should say impossible—to ascribe a sentiment, or even an original sentence, to him the least tinctured with envy, malice, or uncharitableness."—Mackintosh's Life, vol. ii. chap. iv.

"He could not hate: he did not know how to set about it. The gall-bladder was omitted in his composition; and, if he could have been persuaded into any scheme of revenging himself upon an enemy, I am sure (unless he had been narrowly watched) it would have ended in proclaiming the good qualities and promoting the interests of his adversary. . . . A high merit in Sir James Mackintosh was his real and unaffected philanthropy. He did not make the improvement of the great mass of mankind an engine of popularity and a stepping-stone to power; but he had a genuine love of human happiness. . . . When I turn from living spectacles of stupidity, ignorance, and malice, and wish to think better of the world, I remember my great and benevolent friend Mackintosh."—Rev. Sydney Smith: ibid., vol. ii. chap. viii.

As an evidence of his "real and unaffected philanthropy," we may point to the fact that "He gave the most efficient support to Sir S. Romilly's exertions for the improvement of the criminal law, and, after the death of that admirable person, became the leader in that most necessary and unexceptionable branch of reform. . . . The honourable place which his name must ever hold as the associate of Romilly in the great and humane work of ameliorating our criminal law."—Lord Jeffrey: Edin. Rev., lxii. 211, 251.

And see Jeffrey's Essays, 1853, 973. See also Blackw. Mag., lxviii. 357.

"His range of study and speculation," remarks Lord Jeffrey in another place, "was nearly as large as that of Bacon; and there were, in fact, but few branches of learning with which he was not familiar. But in any attempt at delineating his intellectual character, it is necessary to bear in mind that his mastery was in mental philosophy, not merely in its metaphysical departments, but in its still more important application to conduct and affairs, and in their higher branches of politics and legislation, which derive their proofs and principles from history and give authority to its lessons in return.

"Upon all these subjects he was probably the most learned man of his age; and in maturing and digesting his views of them I am persuaded that there have been few, in any age, who ever brought a more powerful and disciplined understanding to bear, with so much candour, caution, and modesty, upon so large a collection of materials. . . . His milder virtues rewarded themselves. The most placable of men turned all his enemies into friends; and he who valued the kindness of others beyond all other possessions died rich in the treasure he valued."—Mackintosh's Life, vol. ii. chap. viii.

"Literary criticism, in that more enlarged sense which blends the subject with the style and genius of the author, was the passion of his mind. His discrimination devoted to this object was equally powerful and acute. He gave to the faculty a sort of metaphysical character by the subtlety with which he exercised it, both in his conversation and writings. . . . Dryden has said that it was more easy for him to write severely than to write gently. He could not readily bring himself to blame. . . . His praise was not for the living alone, nor limited in its object, but a high appreciation of eminent qualities of every kind and of every age. Jealousy was a feeling alien to his nature. In his writings as a reviewer the same temper will be found throughout,—little in accordance, it must be owned, with the critical fashion of the time, yet not the less to be esteemed as a trait in his personal character."—Ibid., vol. ii. chap. vii.

"No loss can be so great to the literary world. His understanding was of so superior a quality, his memory so astonishing, and his disposition so truly courteous and obliging, that he was always willing to instruct every person who approached him. And on every occasion, his entire sympathy with the great interests of mankind, and his enlightened [illegible] of them, were distinctly marked. He was one of those whom, for the benefit of others, one could have wished exempt from the common lot of humanity. One could have said to him, as the Persians to their king, 'Live forever!' He should have been exempted, too, from the common cares of our existence, and, instead of having to make provision for the day that was going over him, should have had nothing to do but to read, to think, and to write. Men of these great intellectual powers should not, like their fabled prototype, be chained to their rock, with the vultures to tear them. Some papers remain, which will afford a melancholy indication of what, under favourable circumstances, he might have done: what he has done, however, is of great value, and will live. He can be properly estimated only by those who were fortunate enough to know him."—Prof. Smyth, of Cambridge: Appendix to his Lects. (Notes on V., VI.) on Mod. Hist.

To a mind thus singularly endowed—uniting profound erudition with accuracy of judgment, and possessing a remarkable skill in the detection of error and ascertainment of truth—we need hardly say that the evidences of Christianity appealed with peculiar force and commanded a ready assent. At home and abroad, the object of attraction to those whose notice is most courted, surrounded by rank and fashion, by beauty and by fame, he seems never to have lost that childlike humility and tenderness of heart which elicited the veneration of his admirers and the love of his friends.

During his last illness, he addressed himself to the great work of preparation for eternity with the calmness of the philosopher and the fervour of the saint. He felt that the command had gone forth—"Set thine house in order, for thou shalt die and not live"—which startled the king in his palace when death was the farthest from his thoughts: but—not, like that king, seeking a prolongation of his earthly term—he delayed not to obey the mandate.

"His children," remarks one of his family, who ministered to his last hours, "were continually the objects of his thoughts, as was manifested from his frequently speaking of them. At other times he would speak of God with more reverence and awe than I have almost ever met with. His voice fell; his whole person seemed to bow down, as if conscious of a superior presence; while in a subdued, solemn, deeply-thoughtful manner, he slowly expressed himself. . . At another time he told me that, during the many sleepless nights he passed, the contemplation of the character of Jesus Christ, and thoughts concerning the gospel, with prayer to God, were his chief occupation. . . . Whenever a word from the Scriptures was repeated to him, he always manifested that he heard it; and I especially observed that, at every mention of the name of Jesus Christ, if his eyes were closed, he always opened them and looked at the person who had spoken. I said to him at one time: 'Jesus Christ loves you,' he answered, slowly, and pausing between each word, 'Jesus Christ—love—the same thing.' He uttered these last words with a most sweet smile."

The sad news of the death of this illustrious person, who had filled so large a place in the public estimation for many years, produced a profound sensation through the learned circles of Great Britain,—and, indeed, throughout Europe. It was felt that a great light had been extinguished; and Science, Philosophy, and Letters mourned a loss which the lapse of many ages might not supply. It was felt—to borrow the language of a distinguished scholar, who thus gave utterance to the convictions of many sorrowing hearts—that

"L'Angleterre a perdu un vertueux citoyen; la littérature un historien profond et philosophique; la jurisprudence un reformateur éclairé; le parlement un orateur dont l'éloquence empruntait toute sa force à la raison et à la justice; l'humanité enfin un défenseur zélé de ses droits et de ses interêts. Il était eminemment Anglais par son patriotisme, et cosmopolite par l'absence des préjugés nationaux."—Augustus William Von Schlegel.

Macklin's Bible, by Nares, illustrated, Lon., 3 vols. 4to, £25. Apocrypha to 1st ed., fol., £18 18*s*. A splendid work, printed in very large type by Bensley, and ornamented with fine engravings.

Macklin, Charles, 1690–1797, a native of Westmeath, Ireland, educated at Trinity College, Dublin, was celebrated for his personation of Shylock, which he continued to perform when between 90 and 100 years of age. Pope complimented him in the two lines,

"This is the Jew
That Shakspeare drew."

He was the author of ten plays, of which the following were very successful: 1. The Man of the World; a Comedy, Lon., 1773, 4to; 1807, 8vo. 2. Love à la Mode; a Farce, 1793, 4to. Both together, 1793, r. 4to. See Memoirs of his Life by James Thomas Kirkman, 1799, 2 vols. 8vo, (see p. 1038 of this Dictionary;) Memoirs of C. MacKnight, James, D.D., 1721–1800, a native of Irving, Argyleshire, educated at the University of Glasgow and at Leyden, took orders in the Church of Scotland, and was from 1753 to '69 pastor of Maybole, Ayrshire, from 1769 to '72 pastor of Jedburgh, and from 1772 until his death one of the ministers of Edinburgh. 1. A Harmony of the Four Gospels; in which the Natural Order of each is preserved, with a Paraphrase and Notes, Lon., 1756, 2 vols. in 1, 4to; 2d ed., 1761, 4to; 3d ed. with Six Discourses on Jewish Antiquities, 1763, 4to; 4th ed., Edin., 1804, 2 vols. 8vo; 5th ed., Lon., 1809, 2 vols 8vo; 6th ed., 1819, 2 vols. 8vo; 7th ed., 1822, 2 vols. 8vo. "Whoever makes use of Macknight's Harmony should compare with it Dr. Lardner's Observations on it."—Bishop Marsh.

These observations occur in a Letter to MacKnight by Dr. Nathaniel Lardner, 1764, 4to, reprinted in the 11th vol. of the 8vo ed. and in the 5th vol. of the 4to ed. of Lardner's collected Works. Macknight's Harmony is in Bishop Tomline's list of books for clergymen.

"This has long been a standard work, and abounds in sound judgment, deep erudition, and a strong vein of correct critical acumen."—Dr. Adam Clarke.

"This is the most valuable work of the kind in the English language. Less violence is done to the text of the Evangelists than by most harmonies; and the evangelical narratives, by being minutely compared, often very happily illustrate one another. . . . His preliminary observations contain useful information: his notes are seldom profound; and the paraphrase contains sentiments which do not accord with the doctrine of the Evangelists."—Orme's Bibl. Bib.

"Much esteemed for some valuable criticisms."—Williams's C. P.

"Dr. Macknight closely adheres to the principle of Osiander; but his paraphrase and commentary contain so much useful information that his Harmony has long been regarded as a standard book among divines. It is in the lists of Bishops Watson and Tomline. The preliminary disquisitions greatly enhance its value."—Horne's Bibl. Bib., 1839, 133.

2. The Truth of Gospel History Shewed: in three books, 1763, 4to. Two portions of this are reprinted in Bishop Watson's Collection of Theolog. Tracts, v.

"A work of great merit."—Bishop Watson.

"This work is admitted by the best judges to be a performance as useful and instructive as any we have on that important subject."—Lowndes's Brit. Lib., 232.

3. The Trans. of the First and Second Epistles to the Thessalonians, with a Comment. and Notes, 1787, 4to. This was pub. as a specimen of No. 4. 4. A New Literal Translation from the Original Greek [which is printed parallel with the trans.] of all the Apostolical Epistles; with a Commentary, and Notes, Philological, Critical, Explanatory, and Practical: to which is added a Hist. of the Life of the Apostle Paul, Edin., 1795, 4 vols. 4to, £5 5*s*., or, without the Greek Text, 3 vols. 4to, £4 4*s*.; 2d ed., with Life of the author by his son, Lon., 1806, 6 vols. 8vo, 52*s*. 6*d*., or, without the Greek Text, 4 vols. 8vo, 36*s*. The eds. which follow are all without the Greek Text: 3d ed., 1809, 4 vols. 8vo; 4th ed., 1816, 4 vols. 8vo, £2; 5th ed., 1821, imp. 8vo; 6th ed., 1835, imp. 8vo, 21*s.*; 7th ed., 1843, r. 8vo, 21*s.* This work was the fruit of the anxious labours of nearly thirty years,—about eleven hours per day being devoted to its preparation. The MS. was written five times by the author's own hand. Few eyes, brains, or hands would have proved equal to this task. Bishop Tomline includes this translation in his list of books for clergymen.

"This is one of the most useful and one of the most dangerous books on the New Testament,—which has thrown considerable light on the Epistles, and, at the same time, has propagated most pernicious views of their leading doctrines. . . . As a critical work it is entitled to rank high. . . . His notes discover very considerable acquaintance with sacred criticism, and, had they contained less of his erroneous theology, would have been very valuable."—Orme's Bibl. Bib.

"A luminous and valuable work."—PARKHURST.

"It may be doubted whether the scope of the sacred authors of these writings was ever, in any former age of Christianity, more fully, clearly, and happily stated than has been done by Dr. Macknight in the general views and illustrations which he has prefixed to the several chapters of the Epistles."—Chambers and Thomson's Biog. Dict., 1855. iii. 529.

"Upon Dr. Macknight's translation of the Epistles—rash, uncouth, and often ungrammatical—no one can set any value apart from the notes and commentary, which, learned and ingenious as they are, have tended more to perplex than to enlighten the biblical student." See Lowndes's Brit. Lib.

"It contains a general Preface and four preliminary Essays of great use; but his sentiments on some controversial points are to be read with caution."—Williams's C. P.

"Objectionable in some of its doctrinal statements. It is an unsound book for the student, but with some useful criticisms."—Bickersteth's C. S.

"It is a work of theological labour not often paralleled, and an ample storehouse of observations to exercise not only the student, but the adept of divinity. If we do not always implicitly coincide with the author in opinion, (which in such various matter cannot reasonably be expected,) we shall always praise his diligence, his learning, and his piety,—qualities which confer no trifling rank on any Scripture interpreter or commentator."—Brit. Crit., O. S., vii., Pref., p. ii.

"We apprehend that few persons who shall peruse this work with competent judgment and due respect for the sacred writings will hesitate to acknowledge that Dr. M. is also entitled to approbation and applause as a faithful translator, a learned and able commentator, and a pious divine."—Lon. Month. Rev., N. S., xviii. 411.

"'Pray, sir,' said the Rev. Robert Balmer to Robert Hall, 'do you admire Macknight as a commentator?' 'Yes, sir,' he replied, 'I do, very much: I think it would be exceedingly difficult, indeed, to come after him in expounding the apostolic epistles. I admit, at the same time, that he has grievous deficiencies: there is a lamentable want of spirituality and elevation about him. He never sets his foot in the other world if he can get a hole to step into in this; and he never gives a passage a meaning which would render it applicable and useful in all ages if he can find in it any local or temporary allusion. He makes fearful havoc, sir, of the text on which you preached to-day. His exposition of it is inimitably absurd.' The text referred to was Ephesians i. 8: 'Wherein he hath abounded towards us in all wisdom and prudence;' and the 'wisdom and prudence' are explained by Macknight, not of the wisdom of God as displayed in the scheme of redemption, but of the wisdom and prudence granted to the apostles to enable them to discharge their office."—Works of Robert Hall, 11th ed., 1853, vi. 121, q. v.

"Nor let the name of Macknight be forgotten. His works are, indeed, the more exclusive property of the disciplined theological student; but the general reader will do well to secure his inviting quartos upon the Gospels and Epistles of the New Testament. In these he will find learning without pedantry, and piety without enthusiasm. In short, no theological collection can be perfect without them. If any man may be said to have exhausted his subject, it is Macknight."—Dibdin's Lib. Comp., ed. 1825, 71.

"Maclaine's translation abounds in faults and deficiencies."—Lowndes's Brit. Lib., 1280.

"It seems to have been the miserable ambition of that translator to make the venerable chancellor of Gottingen speak the flippant language of an 'esprit fort.' It is but just to the memory of a great man to observe that there is very often no equivalent whatever in the original for the silly stuff of the English version."—REV. JOHN G. DOWLING: Pref. to Mosheim's Hist. Eccles.

The student must procure the following works in the original Latin,—viz.:

I. Jo. Laur. Moshemii, D.D., Institutionum Historiæ Ecclesiasticæ Antiquæ et Recentioris, Libri IV., Helmst., 1755, 4to; 1764, 4to.

"Institutiones H. E. sunt exquisite et cum judicio scriptæ."—WEISMANN.

"To speak without figure or exaggeration, the work is the most excellent abridged history of the Church that ever was composed: nor is its method the least of its merit. . . . The only one deserving the name of an Ecclesiastical History."—BISHOP WARBURTON.

"A history at once full, correct, and moderate."—GIBBON, the historian.

Gibbon extols the "amazing impartiality" of Mosheim.

"Extensive learning, uncommon sagacity, and ready eloquence have rarely been so happily combined as they were in Mosheim. His philosophical mind gave to the Church history the form and method of a science; and his works on the subject exhibit a range of erudition, an accuracy of statement, and comprehensive views which command the most profound respect, while they breathe withal a spirit of candour and moderation which scarcely allows us to withhold from him our esteem and confidence."—REV. JOHN G DOWLING: Pref. to Mosheim's Hist. Eccles.

"Of this truly excellent work the least we can say of it is that it is everywhere purchased and everywhere read,—abroad, in the Latin, at home, in our own language. It should be in every library which has any pretensions to a choice selection of books."—Dibdin's Lib. Comp., ed. 1825, 126.

"Mosheim and Milner should be read together."—Claude on the Compos. of a Serm., ed. Lon., 1855, Append., 432.

See MILNER, JOSEPH, No. 4.

"In ecclesiastical history the merits of Mosheim are so decisive and peculiar that I will not venture to compare him with any of his predecessors, or his successors, in this department of learning. He is, as Schroeckh says, our first real historian in Church history."—DR. MURDOCK.

"Mosheim's temper was as far removed from skepticism as credulity: and his piety, though not ardent, was sincere, and indisposed him to treat with ridicule any indications of a religious spirit."—Edin. Rev.

"Mosheim's Ecclesiastical History is recommended because it is more complete than any other I am acquainted with. 'It is in many points very exceptionable; and he, as well as his translator, must be considered as adverse to the Church of England.' See the Bishop of Chester's List of Books, and Bishop Warburton's Character of the work, quoted by the translator."—Kett's Elements, 1803, ii. 423.

A new translation of Mosheim's Hist. Eccles., by James Murdock, D.D., edited with Addits. by Henry Soames, was pub., Lon., 1841, 4 vols. 8vo; 2d ed., 1845, 4 vols. 8vo; 3d ed., revised with Supp. Notes by James Seaton Reid, D.D., 1848, 8vo; 4th ed., 1852, 8vo; 5th ed., 1855, 8vo.

"The translation of this work by Dr. Murdock, and edited by Mr. Soames, is by far the best."—Williams's C. P.

An abridgment of Mosheim's Hist. Eccles., in Latin, was pub. by H. P. C. Henke, Lipsiæ, 1801, 8vo. Other eds. A summary of the work, in English, was pub. by the Rev. Charles Trelawney, Lon., 1822, 8vo; and Examination Questions and Answers on the Eccles. Hist. appeared in 1838.

II. Jo. Laurent. Moshemii de Rebus Christianorum ante Constantinum Magnum Commentarii, Helmst., 1753, 4to. De statu orbis terrarum quum Jesu Christis nasceretur. De statu Judæorum Sæculum, I–4. This work records the events of the three first centuries, and of about twenty-five years of the fourth century.

"In this masterly performance Mosheim enters much more fully into the state of the primitive church than he has an opportunity of doing in his general history."—GIBBON, the historian.

"The reader of ecclesiastical history will find every point connected with those times illustrated in this and the author's In stitutiones. The most copious and accurate references are given to original writers, and every fact and every sentiment is submitted to the most minute and rigid criticism."—DR. BURTON.

"It is much to be regretted that this excellent work has never been translated into English, as it would so well fill up the defective account of the three first centuries in the Ecclesiastical History."—Kett's Elements, &c., 1803, ii. 423.

A trans. into English,—Commentaries on the Affairs of the Christians, &c.,—by R. S. Vidal, was pub., Lon., 1813–35, 3 vols. 8vo.

"An excellent, faithful version."—Lowndes's Brit. Lib., 1281.

But this translation only reaches to the end of the twenty-seventh section of Century Third. Reprinted, with the trans. completed, under the title of Historical Commentaries on the State of Christianity during the first three hundred and twenty-five years from the Christian Era: vol. i. trans. by R. S. Vidal; vol. ii. trans., and both vols. edited, by James Murdock, D.D., New York, 1851, 2 vols. 8vo.

"If Tillemont and the French Historians were warped by the spirit of Romanism, Mosheim and others of his school are to be read with caution, as having been influenced by that love of scepticism which has shown itself so much more openly and more dangerously in the German divines of our day."—DR. MacLean, John, M.D., 1771–1814, a native of Glasgow, and the son of a distinguished surgeon of that city of the same name, pursued his medical studies at Glasgow, Edinburgh, London, and Paris, and commenced the practice of surgery at Glasgow in 1791; came to America in 1795, and in the same year was appointed Professor of Chemistry and Natural History in the College of New Jersey, at Princeton; Professor of Natural Philosophy and Mathematics in the same institution, 1797–1812; Professor of Natural Philosophy and Chemistry in the College of William and Mary, 1812. In consequence of the failure of his health, he returned to Princeton, where he died in February, 1814. As an author this eminent scholar is best known by his two lectures on Combustion, Phila., 1797, 8vo, in which he advocates the Lavoisierian system of Chemistry in opposition to Dr. Priestley, and by a number of papers, in controversy with Priestley, pub. in the New York Medical Repository.

MacLean, John, LL.D., b. March 11, 1785, in Morris county, New Jersey, was admitted to the practice of the law in 1807, and settled at Lebanon, Ohio; elected to the National House of Representatives in 1812, and again in 1815; elected to the Bench of the Supreme Court of Ohio, 1816; Commissioner of the General Land Office, 1822; Post-Master General of the U. States, 1823; Associate Justice of the Supreme Court of the United States, 1829. Judge MacLean has several times declined a nomination to the office of President of the United States. To this valuable institution he made gifts amounting in the aggregate to the value of $25,000. 1. Observations on the Geology of the United States of America, Phila., 1817, 8vo. The geological part of this work was first pub. in vol. vi. Amer. Philos. Trans. In this ed. there are some additions and corrections, besides two new chapters, which are "an attempt to apply Geology to Agriculture," &c. See Preface.

"Mr. Maclure appears to be very thoroughly conversant with his subject, and to have studied with great attention the geological structure of a considerable part of Europe. He is a disciple of Werner; but we recognise him as such more by the descriptive language he employs than by his theoretical opinions. His general views are much more enlarged and philosophical than are usually met with in geologists of that school; and, like most of those who have had opportunities of extensive observation, he has found that the theory of the Freyburg professor is of a very limited application. The following remarks in his Preface are a sufficient proof that his geological creed is not that of Werner."—Edin. Rev., xxx. 375, q. v.

Mr. Maclure crossed the Alleghany Mountains fifty times in the course of his geological investigations. 2. "Six of the Essays were written at Paris, at the request of the Editor of the Revue Encyclopédique, for publication in that work; but they were excluded by the censors of the press as too democratic. They were afterwards translated into Spanish, and published at Madrid," &c.

3. Catalogue of Mineralogical and Geological Specimens at New Harmony, Indiana, collected in various parts of Europe and America. Arranged by D. D. Owens, 1840, 8vo. He presented five thousand volumes to the library of the Academy of Natural Sciences. A biographical notice of Mr. Maclure, by Samuel George Morton, M.D., of Philadelphia, will be found in the Amer. MacMichael, Morton, b. in Burlington county, New Jersey, Oct. 20, 1807, one of the most eminent of American orators, was connected as a contributor with almost all of the periodicals—monthly, weekly, and daily —issued in Philadelphia from 1824 to '44. Since 1844 he has been exclusively occupied with the editorial duties of the North American newspaper. A specimen of his poetry —a monody—will be found in The Philadelphia Book, 1836, 209. We know of but few productions more justly entitled to warm commendation. It is to be regretted that so able a master of the language should not devote his leisure hours to the preparation of some work of permanent interest and worthy of his genius.

MacNeile, Hugh, D.D., b. 1793, at Ballycastle, county of Antrim, Ireland, educated at Trinity College, Dublin; preached for some time at Charlotte Street Chapel, Fitzroy Square, London; subsequently became the incumbent of St. Jude's Chapel, Liverpool, and is now the incumbent of St. Paul's, Prince's Park, in the vicinity of the same city. Mr. MacNeile is one of the most popular of living preachers, and has been eminently successful in the exercise of his ministerial duties. In 1822, he married the daughter of Dr. William Magee, the late Archbishop of Dublin. It has been erroneously stated that Mr. MacNeile was at one time a tutor in Dr. Magee's family. He has never been a tutor in any family. 1. Seventeen Serms., 1825, 8vo; 3d ed., 1838, 12mo. 2. Serm. on Rev. xviii. 4, 1826, 8vo. 3. Three Serms., 1827, 8vo.

Dr. MacNeile has also pub. some other occasional discourses, several controversial tracts against Romanism, and is one of the authors of Unitarianism Confuted, a Series of Lectures, 1839, 8vo; and of Destiny of the Jews, &c., a Course of Lectures, 1841, p. 8vo.

The first-named volume contains lectures by Buddicom, Haldane Stewart, Stowell, Dalton, and others; and the contributors to the last-named course, besides MacNeile, were Haldane Stewart, Buddicom, Ould, Fremantle, Dallas, Raikes, Bates, and Grimshawe. Further particulars of this eloquent and excellent divine will be found in Pen-Pictures of Popular English Preachers, Lon., 1852, 82–96; Fish's Pulpit Eloquence of the Nineteenth Century, N. York, 1857, 568; Dr. S. H. Tyng's Recollections of England; Dublin Univ. Mag., xxix. 462–471; Francis's Orators of the Age. Francis's biographical account of MacNeile is incorrect in several particulars: corrections of his errors will be found in Dubl. Univ. Mag., xxix. 471. Dr. Tyng describes a sermon of Dr. MacNeile's as combining, in an extraordinary degree, "unrivalled excellencies of subject, mind, and matter;" and the author of Pen-Pictures of Popular English Preachers remarks that "The voice of Dr. MacNeile is wonderfully fine, and is as superior to that of any other person we have ever heard as the tones of the organ are to that of any other musical instrument."—P. 93.

"It was hoped by many of the evangelical friends of the Church of England, both in Canada and on the Eastern provinces, that he would have received the appointment of bishop to some of the recently-vacant provincial sees; and no man in England better deserved such a preferment. Dr. MacNeile would be widely useful to the British colonies of North America."—Fish's Pulpit Eloquence, &c., 568.

MacNeven, William James, M.D., 1763–1841, a native of Ballynahowne, county of Galway, Ireland, educated at Prague and Vienna, commenced the practice of medicine at Dublin; was imprisoned on account of his political principles in 1798; became a captain in the Irish Brigade, French Army, in 1803; emigrated to New York in 1805, and practised physic with great reputation until his decease. He occupied several important professional positions. 1. Essay on the Use and Construction of the Mine-Auger; from the German of Mr. Geise, Lon., 1788, 8vo. 2. A Ramble through Switzerland, 1804. 3. Pieces of Irish History illustrative of the Condition of the Catholics of Ireland, &c., N. York, 1807, 8vo. 4. An Exposition of the Atomic Theory, 1804. Received "with favour both at home and abroad." Dr. MacNeven also edited an ed. of Brande's Chemistry, contributed two or three medical essays to the New York Medical and Philosophical Journal, (of which he was co-editor,) and pub. some other professional papers. See some interesting reminiscences of Dr. MacNeven by Dr. John W. Francis, of New York, in Williams's Amer. Med. Biog., 1845, 376–382.

"This fellow must be a blockhead. They don't know how to go about their abuse. Who will read a five-shilling book against me? No, sir: if they had wit, they should have kept pelting me with pamphlets."—DR. JOHNSON: ubi supra.

Boswell supposes this work to have been written by "another Scotchman;" and Sir James Mackintosh presumes this other Scotchman to have been James Macpherson, (Ossian.) MacNicol declared that the "scurrility" was inserted in the MS. without his knowledge and after he had sent it for publication. The lines which especially excited Boswell's ire were the following:

"But, whatever the Doctor may insinuate about the present scarcity of trees in Scotland, we are much deceived by fame if a near ancestor of his, who was a native of that country, did not find to his cost that tree was not quite such a rarity in his days."—P. 18, ed. 1778.

Upon which Croker remarks,

"There seems no reason whatsoever to believe that any of Dr. Johnson's family were natives of Scotland."—Boswell's Johnson, ed. 1848, r. 8vo, 5. 443.

Macnish, Robert, M.D., LL.D., 1802–1837, a native and resident of Glasgow, a favourite contributor (The Modern Pythagorean) to Blackwood's and Fraser's Magazines, and to other periodicals, pub. four vols., two of which (Nos. 1 and 2) still maintain their reputation. 1. The Anatomy of Drunkenness, 1827, 12mo, pp. 56; 10th ed., 1854, fp. 8vo.

"This little book is evidently the production of a man of genius The style is singularly neat, terse, concise, and vigorous, far beyond the reach of any ordinary mind; the strain of sentiment is such as does infinite honour to the author's heart; and the observation of human life by which every page is characterized speaks a bold, active, and philosophical intellect. As a medical treatise, it is excellent; and to those who stand in need of advice and warning it is worth a hundred sermons."—Blackw. Mag., xxiii. 481–499.

2. The Philosophy of Sleep; new ed., 1854, 18mo.

"The second edition has been enriched with many important additions; in particular, a long chapter on Spectral Illusions,—one of the most interesting portions of the work. We have seldom met with a work more worthy of a place in every well-furnished library. It will interest equally the reader for amusement and the philosophical thinker."—Edin. Phrenolog. Jour.

"We have been captivated by the eloquence—we had almost said the poetry—of its descriptions; and, on the whole, we must say that we consider it to be one of the most valuable and amusing books of philosophy we have met with for this long time past."—Lon. Med. Gaz.

"We must here close our extracts from a work which will be perused with interest and delight. It may be considered the most valuable contribution which philosophy, poetry, and physical science, in agreeable combination, have lately made to the illustration of the study of man's nature viewed in close alliance with his 'being's end and aim.'"—*Edin. 3. Book of Aphorisms, 1833; 2d ed., 1840, 18mo.

"It is a budget of six hundred and seventy-five wise and humorous sayings on almost every subject under heaven,—religion, politics, education, cookery, phrenology, shaving, politeness, pugilism, national manners, poetry, human character, travelling criticisms, drunkenness, quackery, prejudice, scenery, and genius."—Edin. Chronicle.

"There is no subject, however various, upon which we have not an aphorism strictly original."—Glasgow Argus.

"The Book of Aphorisms is a highly curious production. The author calls himself a Modern Pythagorean: he is certainly a man of wit. Some of these remarkable sayings will be found highly useful; others are humorous, and not a few exquisitely satirical."—Lon. Weekly Dispatch.

4. Introduction to Phrenology, 1835; 2d ed. same year. Highly commended by the Phrenological Journal. It will worthily occupy a place in the library of the statesman and the scholar, of the private gentleman and the merchant."—Lon. Monthly Review.

One "statesman and scholar" seems to have found it dull reading:

"I have finished the first volume of Macpherson's 'Annals of Commerce,'—a laborious compilation, seeming ample with respect to England, and scanty about other countries, with no elegance, not much order, nor illuminated by general principles."—Sir James Mackintosh's Diary: Life, vol. ii. chap. iii.

Macpherson, James, M.D., 1738–1796, a native of Ruthven, Invernesshire, Scotland, educated at King's College and Marischal College, Aberdeen, and at the University of Edinburgh; was intended for the Church, —although it is doubtful whether he ever received holy orders. He acted for some time as the teacher of Ruthven School, and subsequently as a private tutor; in 1764 accompanied Governor Johnson to Pensacola, Florida, as private secretary; about 1780 was rewarded for his services as a political pamphleteer by being appointed agent to the Nabob of Arcot, and was returned to Parliament in 1780, '84, and '90. His first attempt at composition gave little promise of the literary ability displayed in the authorship or editorship of Ossian. It was an Heroic Poem in 6 Cantos, pub. in 1758, 12mo, entitled The Highlander, and is admitted to be beneath criticism Whilst a tutor in the family of Mr. Graham, of Balgowan, Macpherson exhibited to John Home, the author of Douglas, what he styled Translations of Fragments of Gaelic Poetry, such as were still recited by the inhabitants of the Highlands. Home communicated this statement to others, and his friends Blair, Carlyle, and Ferguson urged Macpherson not to conceal such treasures, but at to publish them to the world. Accordingly, Macpherson pub., in 1760, Fragments of Ancient Poetry, collected in the Highlands of Scotland and translated from the Gaelic or Erse Language. This book excited much attention, and a subscription was entered into to enable the editor to travel in the Highlands and collect all that he could find of these precious relics. The results of this mission were given to the public in two vols.,—viz.: 1. Fingal; an Ancient Poem, in Six Books, together with several other Poems composed by Ossian, son of Fingal, trans. from the Gaelic language, Lon., 1762, 4to. 2. Temora; an Ancient Epic Poem in Eight Books, together with several Poems, composed by Ossian, son of Fingal, trans. from the Gaelic Language, 1763, 4to. These volumes (by which the author or editor pocketed £1200) were received with enthusiastic applause, and in less than a year after their first appearance were translated into almost every language of Europe. We have already had occasion to notice two of the best of the edits. pub. in England, (see LAING, MALCOLM, M.P., No. 2; MACFARLANE, ROBERT, No. 3,) and a number of the controversial publications elicited by this wonderful discovery.(?) Those who take the trouble to read all these volumes and papers, and many others enumerated by Lowndes, (Bibl. Man.,) will display great industry. The controversy respecting the authenticity of these celebrated poems was a long and fierce one. Dr. Blair, Dr. Gregory, Dr. Graham, Lord Kames, Sir John Sinclair, and Archibald Donald, led the Ossianites, and David Hume, Dr. Johnson, Malcom, Dr. Smith, and Mr. Shaw, were the chiefs of the opposition. When Johnson paid his famous visit to the Hebrides, he took pains to examine the question for himself, and communicated the results of his investigations in very decided terms:

"I believe they [the poems of Ossian] never existed in any other form than that which we have seen. The editor or author never could shew the original; nor can it be shewn by any other. To avenge reasonable incredulity by refusing evidence is a degree of insolence with which the world is not yet acquainted; and stubborn audacity is the last refuge of guilt. It would be easy to shew it if he had it: but whence could it be had? It is too long to be remembered, and the language had formerly nothing written. . . . The Scots have something to plead for their easy reception of an improbable fiction: they are seduced by their fondness for their supposed ancestors. A Scotsman must be a sturdy moralist who does not love Scotland better than truth: he will always love it better than inquiry, and, if falsehood flatters his vanity, will not be very diligent to detect it."—Tour to the Hebrides.

These comments—not the most complimentary, certainly —irritated Macpherson beyond endurance; and he sat down and despatched an angry letter to the lexicographer, promising to quicken his critical perceptions by the application of an oaken staff, and thus convert him into an Ossianite vi et armis. The gruff moralist was not easily alarmed by such belligerent demonstrations; and he accordingly favored his correspondent with the following polite epistle:

"JAMES MACPHERSON: I received your foolish and impudent letter. Any violence offered to me I shall do my best to repel, and what I cannot do for myself, the law shall do for me. I hope I shall never be deterred from detecting what I think a cheat by the menaces of a ruffian. What would you have me retract? I thought your book an imposture: I think it an imposture still. For this opinion I have given my reasons to the public, which I here dare you to refute. Your rage I defy. Your abilities, since your Homer, are not so formidable; and what I hear of your morals inclines me to pay regard, not to what you shall say, but to what you shall prove. You may print this if you will.

"SAM. JOHNSON."

Macpherson found that there was nothing to be made by quarrelling with the philosopher of Bolt Court, and wisely left him to ridicule Ossian at his pleasure. Lord Macaulay remarks (Life of Johnson, in Encyc. Brit.,8th ed.) that "Fingal had been proved in the Journal to be an impudent forgery;" and in his review of Croker's Boswell's Johnson he thus notices the same controversy:

"The contempt which he felt for the trash of Macpherson was indeed just; but it was, we suspect, just by chance. He despised the Fingal for the very reason which led many men of genius to admire it. He despised it, not because it was essentially coumonplace, but because it had a superficial air of originality."—Essays, 1854, i. 393; and in Edin. Rev., Sept. 1831.

Neither Dr. Johnson's nor Mr. Macaulay's language seems to please a modern critic in the Eclectic Review, (ubi supra,) who, not doubting that Macpherson was Ossian, declares that

"Dear, nevertheless, to every Scottish heart will forever remain those beautiful fragments. In spite of Dr. Johnson's criticism, and the more insolent one of Macaulay, they will continue to hear in the monotony of the strain the voice of the mountain-torrent and the roar of the tempest," &c.

Lord Brougham, referring to the indignation excited among the Scotch by the publication of Johnson's strictures, remarks,

"Had he only believed in 'Ossian's Poems,' nothing would ever have been heard but satisfaction with the 'Journey' and respect for its author. His opinion was strong, his arguments were powerful; he plainly gave the right name to an attempt at deceiving which had failed with him; it was highly offensive to those concerned in the fabrication and it was somewhat disreputable to their dupes: his unqualified opinion remained unrefuted; his arguments are to this day unanswered, and the believers found it more easy to rail at him than to refute."—Lives of Men of Letters of the Time of George III.: Johnson: ed. Lon. and Glasg., 1855, 359-360.

The eulogies of the critic of the Eclectic Review may remind the reader of Sir Walter Scott's early enjoyment of Ossian:

"You recall to me some very pleasant feelings of my boyhood when you ask my opinion of Ossian. . . . Ossian and Spenser were two books which the old bard [Dr. Blacklock] put into my hands, and which I devoured rather than perused. Their tales were for a long time so much my delight that I could repeat without remorse whole Cantos of the one and Duans of the other; and wo to the unlucky wight who undertook to be my auditor, for in the height of my enthusiasm I was apt to disregard all hints that my recitations became tedious."—Letter to Miss Seward: Lockhart's Life of Scott, Abbotsford ed. Edin., 1850, 128.

Dr. Parr speaks much to the same effect:

"I read this book when a boy, and was enamoured with it. When at college I again read Ossian with increased delight. I now, although convinced of the imposture, find pleasure in reading Macpherson."—Bibliotheca Parriana.

Professor Wilson also admits that he once thought that

"Homer and Virgil, though the gods of our young idolatry,—sunbright both in the golden morn of our imagination,—were not greater or more glorious orbs of song than our own Ossian. Was that belief delusion all? Are the songs of Selma but unmeaning words,—idle as the inarticulate winds, the murmurs of the Harp and Voice of Cona? Let us return, if we can, to our old creed; let us abjure, if we can, the folly of wisdom," &c.—Blackw. Mag., xlvi. 693, Nov. 1839.

"In our own country," proceeds Wilson, "one seldom now hears the name; and the rant, bombast, and fustian of Macpherson have long been the ridicule, not merely of our critics, but of some of our greatest living poets. Wordsworth even waxes witty, and exclaims, 'All hail, Macpherson! hail to thee, sire of Ossian.'"

Wilson remarks, in an amusing letter to Hogg, written many years before the preceding,

"If Ossian did write the poems attributed to him, or any poems like them, he was a dull dog, and deserved never to taste whiskey as long as he lived. A man that lives forever among mists and mountains knows better than to be always prosing about them. Methinks I feel about objects familiar to infancy and manhood; but when we speak of them it is only upon great occasions and in situations of deep passion. Ossian was probably born in a flat country."

Wordsworth tells us,

"Having had the good fortune to be born and reared in a mountainous country, from my very childhood I have felt the falsehood that pervades the volumes imposed upon the world under the name of Ossian. From what I saw with my own eyes, I knew that the imagery was spurious," &c.

Upon this Henry Neele remarks, with some acuteness,

"This objection, however, cuts both ways: these Poems were written, if not by Ossian, by Macpherson, who was himself a Highlander."—Lects. on English Poetry, Lect. III. 74.

That so rigid a critic as Gray should have been a believer in Ossian is certainly not a little surprising. Hume the historian, a man of much less critical acumen in poetry, could write to Gibbon,

"I see you entertain a great doubt with regard to the authenticity of the poems of Ossian. You are certainly right in so doing. It is indeed strange that any men of sense could have imagined it possible that above twenty thousand verses, along with numberless historical facts, could have been preserved by oral tradition during fifty generations, by the rudest, perhaps, of all the European nations, the most necessitous, the most turbulent, and the most unsettled. Where a supposition is so contrary to common sense, any positive evidence of it ought never to be regarded. Men run with great avidity to give their evidence in favour of what flatters their passions and their national prejudices. You are therefore over-and-above indulgent to us in speaking of the matter with hesitation."—Edinburgh, 18th March, 1776: Gibbon's Memoirs, ed. Lon., 1837, 94-95.

This may remind the reader of Churchill's lines:

"Ossian, sublimest, simplest bard of all,
Whom English infidels Macpherson call."

Hume speaks of men running to give evidence: but what were the results of the laborious investigations of the Committee of the Highland Society?

"The Highland Society have lately set about investigating—or, rather, I should say, collecting—materials to defend the authenticity of Ossian. Those researches have only proved that there were no real originals—using that word as is commonly understood—to be found for them. . . . I am compelled to admit that incalculably the greater part of the English Ossian must be ascribed to Macpherson himself, and that his whole introductions, notes, &c. &c. are an absolute tissue of forgeries."—SIR WALTER SCOTT: Life, 128.

Scott proceeds to remark:

"When once the Highlanders had adopted the poems of Ossian as an article of national faith, you would far sooner have got them to disavow the Scripture than to abandon a line of the contested tales. Only they all allow that Macpherson's translation is very unfaithful, and some pretend to say inferior to the original. . . . But all agree as to the gross infidelity of Macpherson as a translator and editor."—Ibid., 128, 283.

"With regard to the authenticity of these Poems as a whole," remarks Dr. Watt, "there has been much discussion, and the question remains, at present, in a great manner sub judicio; but that such a person as Ossian existed, and the heroes he celebrates, and that many parts of his Poems are preserved as traditionary among the Highlands of Scotland, has been attested on the fullest and most indubitable evidence."—Bibl. Brit., 1828.

"It is yet a question," says Allan Cunningham, "how much of these works belongs to antiquity: the names, many of the actions, and some of the composition, have been proved of old date."—Biog. and Crit. Hist. of the Lit. of the Last Fifty Years, 1833.

Blair's Critical Dissertation was thought to prove the authenticity of Ossian beyond all reasonable question:

"It gave the law to all Europe. The finest spirits in the Continent fortified by it their admiration of the genius displayed in these extraordinary poems, set no bounds to their enthusiasm, and Ossian in France, Germany, Italy, was all the rage."—PROF. WILSON: Blackw. Mag., xlvi. 693.

But Malcolm Laing's overwhelming charge (ubi supra) dealt confusion to the ranks of the adherents of Ossian, and they have never since been able to make another rally:

"I consider your Ossian and Farmer's 'Essay' on Shakspeare's pretended learning," writes a distinguished critic to Mr. Laing, "as the two most complete demonstrations of literary positions that have ever been produced. But yours was an enterprise of far greater difficulty, and required a far other sort of acuteness and erudition than ferreting out half a score of black-letter translations. I only compare you in completeness of proof. You know how bitterly old Klopstock complained of you for having dispelled his Ossianic illusions. I should like to know how Cesarotti relishes the annihilation of the bard a translation from whom forms so great a part of his fame; and I should be still more anxious to hear how the Corsican [Buonaparte] endures (if he has heard of it) your destruction of his only classic."—SIR JAMES MACKINTOSH: Life, vol. i. chap. vii.

The usual equanimity of the amiable Blair rises into enthusiasm when the good doctor was luxuriating in the mystic fervour of the Son of Fingal; and he does not hesitate to declare that to Ossian "we may boldly assign a place among those works which are to last for ages."

3. Introduction to the History of Great Britain and Ireland, 1771, 4to; 3d ed., enlarged, 1773, 4to. Answered by Rev. John Whitaker, in the Genuine History of the Britons asserted in a full and candid Refutation of Mr. Macpherson's Introduc., &c., 1772, 8vo, and by Rev. 4. The Iliad of Homer, trans. into English prose, 1773, 2 vols. 4to, revised throughout and carefully corrected

2d ed., 1773, 4to. This was an attempt to conform Homer to the rhythm and style of Ossian.

"Its reception was mortifying in the extreme. Men of learning laughed at it, critics abused it; and, notwithstanding some strenuous efforts on the part of his friends, particularly Sir John Elliot, it finally sank under one universal shout of execration and contempt."

"Your abilities, since your Homer," well remarked Dr. Johnson, "are not so formidable."

"Mr. Macpherson, in his translation of Homer,—a work otherwise valuable, as containing for the most part a faithful translation of his author,—has generally adopted an inverted construction, which is incompatible with the genius of the English language."—TYTLER.

"There is nothing which serves to set Macpherson's character and powers in a stronger light than his egregious attempt to render the great father of poetry into prose, however natural it might have been for him to have made this attempt after his success in doing the same office to Ossian."—DR. GRAHAM.

We have already referred to this work,—for which Macpherson received £3000,—and to his Original Papers, in our life of THOMAS CARTE, p. 346 of this Dictionary, q. v.

Fox declared that Macpherson's History was "full of impudent falsehoods;" but Fox did not fancy the revelations made by Macpherson's documents respecting the purity and patriotism of some of those who brought about the Revolution of 1688.

Professor Smyth says, with better temper,

"This History must always be resorted to whenever an unfavourable representation is wanted of the conduct or character of William."—Lects. on Mod. Hist., Lect. XXII.

6. Original Papers: containing the Secret History of Great Britain from the Restoration to the Accession of the House of Hanover: to which are prefixed Extracts from the Life of James II., as written by himself, Lon., 1775, 2 vols. 4to. This work is condemned for unfaithfulness by Professor Smyth, and from his comments we have given an extract, (see CARTE, THOMAS, p. 346 of this Dictionary;) but the historical student must peruse the whole of his criticism in the Lects. XVIII. and XXIII. on Modern History. Yet Macpherson's State Papers contain much of value, and must not be denied a place in the historical library.

We have referred to his political pamphlets; and there is one which, as an American, we presume we ought to mention at least by name,—The Rights of Great Britain Asserted against the Claims of the Colonies: being an Answer to the Declaration of the General Congress, 1776, 8vo. Notwithstanding Mr. Macpherson's indignation, the "Colonies" persisted in their unreasonable "claims." May the time be far distant when the voice of international discord shall be heard in the councils of either country, when any "root of bitterness" springing up shall disturb the peace of those whose highest prosperity depends so greatly upon relations of amity and good will.

The author undertakes to prove, by a historico-philological argument, that it was not 'Jehovah,' but Yaveh; that it does not mean 'I am,' (self-existence,) but 'He who Will Be, or Come,' (The Deliverer;) in short, that the Jehovah of the Old Testament and the 'Christ' of the New denote one and the same being."

"We sincerely wish that these volumes may have a wide circulation. Never was a more timely publication. We have here a most potent persuasive to that justice to Ireland which is now more than ever the first duty and necessity of Great Britain. Our heart's desire is that both there and here, by the Government and by the people, the lessons which come out from the 'Lives and Times of the United Irishmen' may be read, marked, learned, and inwardly digested."—Westminster Review, Aug.

Also commended by The Athenæum, Bell's Messenger, Pilot, Planet, S. Times, M. Advertiser, July 25, 1842, Freeman's Journal, July 27, 1842. Severely condemned by the Dublin Univ. Mag., 1st ser., in vol. xx. 480–508; 2d ser., in vol. xxviii. 536–550. We give some extracts:

"There are many who will tolerate the dulness because of the sedition of the pages before us. . . . Thank God that Dr. Madden has had to write of the defeat and not of the successes of those whose ill-starred enterprises he narrates, and whose memories he would fain enshrine in the admiration of his readers. . . . That his account of the Irish Rebellion, and of the traitors who figured in it, is that of a blinded and inveterate partisan, must be manifest to every competent and candid inquirer."—xxviii. 538–550.

Another review of The United Irishmen will be found in Eclec. Rev., 4th ser., xii. 400. In 1856, 12mo, there was pub. in New York an extract from this work, under the title of The Life and Times of Robert Emmet, by R. R. Madden, with Numerous Notes and Additions, and a Memoir of Thomas Addis Emmet. Madden's text has been altered, and valuable information added from more recent authorities. 6. "Mr. Madden's book will be a welcome one to many English readers, as containing a full account of a remarkable person whose name is perhaps better known in this country than that of any other Romish martyr. But it is by no means a good 'Life.' The materials collected are rich and interesting: they are wanting, however, in art and orderly disposition."—Lon. Athen., 1853, p. 1009.

"There is but one really good letter in the volumes; and that is written by Charles Dickens from Milan. . . . Dr. Madden's part of the book is made up in the worst possible manner. Not content with the infinite deal of nothing with which the volumes are filled, he must needs crowd into a heavy appendix such trash as," &c.—N. Amer. Rev., lxxxi. 257.

12. Phantasmata; or, Illusions and Fanaticisms of Protean Forms Productive of Great Evils, 1857, 2 vols. 8vo. This book seems to have disappointed the expectations of some of the critics: see Westminster Review, July, 1857; London Critic, June 1, 1857.

"If we were to set aside all the passages in Dr. Madden's volumes which he has quoted from ancient or modern authors, there would be little left of his own to quote, and that little is loosely and bewilderingly written. But, what with citations and appliances and a trifle of original matter, he has published a work that is of considerable interest."—Lon. Athen., April 18, 1857, 493.

Madden, Samuel, D.D., 1687–1765, was the author of Memoirs of the Twentieth Century, purporting to be in 6 vols., one only of which appeared,—1733, 8vo,—and 890 of the 1000 copies issued were recalled and destroyed by the author four days after publication. He also pub. Reflections and Resolutions Proper for the Gentlemen of Ireland, 1738, 1816, 8vo; Boulter's Monument, a Poem, Corrected for the Press by Dr. Saml. Johnson, 1743; A Prefatory Epistle to Leland's Life of Philip of Macedon; some minor tracts; and wrote a tragedy entitled Themistocles, or The Lover of his Country. In 1740 he founded a society in Dublin for the improvement of the useful and fine arts by means of premiums to be distributed by the Dublin Society, of which he was the institutor. See Nichols's Lit. Madison, James, 1749–1812, a native of Rockingham county, Virginia, educated at William and Mary College; Prof. of Mathematics in his Alma Mater, 1773, President, 1777 to '84, and Prof. of Natural, Moral, and Political Philosophy from 1784 until his death; Bishop of the Prot. Epis. Church in the diocese of Virginia, 1788. He pub. a Thanksgiving Serm., 1781; Letter to J. Morse, 1795; Address to the Episcopal Church, 1799; Serm. on the Death of Washington, 1800; a large Map of Virginia; and several papers in Barton's Journal, and in Trans. Amer. Soc., ii. 197, iii. 150, iv. 313. See Allen's Amer. Biog. Dict., 3d ed., 1857, 543.

Madison, James, 1751–1836, a native of Port Conway, on the Rappahannock, Virginia, graduated at Princeton College, 1771; elected to the General Assembly of Virginia, 1776; member of the Continental Congress, 1779 to '85, and again chosen in 1786; member of the Convention which adopted the Constitution of the United States, 1787; remained in Congress until 1797; elected to the General Assembly of Virginia, 1798; an Elector in 1800; Secretary of State of the United States, 1801–09; President of the United States, 1809–17; member of the Convention to Revise the Constitution of Virginia, 1829. He was the author of twenty-nine numbers of The Federalist, already specified, (see HAMILTON, MAJOR-GENERAL ALEXANDER,) and of other political papers, and noted down and left for publication the Debates of the Convention which formed the Constitution of the United States. These Debates, with his Correspondence, were pub. in 1840, 3 vols. 8vo. See GILPIN, HENRY D. A 4to vol. of Madison's Correspondence was printed by MacGuire, of Washington, for private circulation. It is stated that the Hon. William C. Rives, of Virginia, will shortly publish a further collection of Madison's Papers; and a life of the author, from the same pen,—to be pub. by the Virginia Historical Society,—is among the literary expectations of the day. There are probably enough of Mr. Madison's unpublished MSS. extant to fill twelve to fifteen octavo volumes. A granite monument to his memory—a plain obelisk, twenty feet in height—has recently (1857) been prepared at the expense of his old friends and neighbours in Orange co., Virginia. For further information respecting Mr. Madison, see National Portrait-Gallery of Distinguished Americans, Phila., 1852, vol. iii.; Works of Thomas Jefferson; histories of the United States; the literature of the Revolutionary period generally; Judge Story's Life and Letters, 1851, ii. 420; Curtis's Hist. of the Constit. of the U. An eminent contemporary of Madison, referring to the many public positions into which the latter was called in quick succession from the period of early youth, remarks:

"Trained in these successive schools, he acquired a habit of self-possession which placed at ready command the rich resources of his luminous and discriminating mind, of his extensive information, and rendered him first of every assembly afterwards of which he became a member. . . . With these consummate powers were united a pure and spotless virtue, which no calumny has ever attempted to sully. Of the powers and policy of his pen, and of the wisdom of his administration in the highest office of the nation, I need say nothing: they have spoken, and will forever speak, for themselves."—Thomas Jefferson's Autobiography: Jefferson's Works, ed. 1853, i. 41.

"Of the public life of James Madison what could I say that is not deeply impressed upon the memory and upon the heart of every one within the sound of my voice? Of his private life, what but must meet an echoing shout of applause from every voice within this hall? Is it not, in a pre-eminent degree, by emanations from his mind that we are assembled here as the representatives of the people and States of this Union? Is it not transcendently by his exertions that we address each other here by the endearing appellation of countrymen and fellow-citizens?"—Speech of John Quincy Adams, in the National House of Representatives, on the announcement of the death of Mr. Madison.

"Madison lacked neither ability nor inclination for speculative inquiries, and had a mind capable of enforcing the application of whatever principles he espoused. Yet his calm good sense, and the tact with which he could adapt theory to practice, were no less among his prominent characteristics."—Ticknor's Hist. of the Constit. of the U. States, i. 388.

"I entirely concur with you in your estimate of Mr. Madison,—his private virtues, his extraordinary talents, his comprehensive and statesmanlike views. To him and Hamilton, I think, we are mainly indebted for the Constitution of the United States; and in wisdom I have long been accustomed to place him before Jefferson. You and I know something more of each of them in trying times than the common politicians of our day can possibly arrive at. I wish some one who was perfectly fitted for the task would write a full and accurate biography of Madison. I fear that it can hardly be done now; for the men who best appreciated his excellences have nearly all passed away. 'What shadows we are!'"—Judge Story to Hon. Ezekiel Bacon, Cambridge, April 30, 1842 · Story's Life and Letters, ii. 420.

Madox, Isaac, D.D., 1697–1759, a native of London, educated at one of the universities of Scotland and at Queen's College, Cambridge, became Rector of St. Vedast, Foster Lane, London; Dean of Wells, 1733; Bishop of St. Asaph, 1736; trans. to Worcester, 1743. He pub. a number of serms., Lon., 1734–53, and a review of the first volume of Neal's Hist. of the Puritans, under the title of A Vindication of the Government, Doctrine, and Worship of the Church of England established in the Reign of Queen Elizabeth, 1733, 8vo. Magee, William, D.D., 1765–1831, a native of Ireland, was educated at Trinity College, Dublin, where he became Assistant Professor of the Oriental Languages, and in 1806 Senior Fellow and Professor of Mathematics; Dean of Cork, 1813; Bishop of Raphoe, 1819; Archbishop of Dublin, 1822. This learned prelate pub. several serms. and charges, a Memoir of Thomas Percival, M.D., and the following work, by which he is best known: Discourses and Dissertations on the Scriptural Doctrine of Atonement and Sacrifice, 1801, 8vo; 2d ed., 1812, 2 vols. 8vo; 3d ed., 1816, 3 vols. 8vo, vol. iii. sold separately to complete former eds.; 4th ed., 1817, 8vo; 5th ed., 1832, 3 vols. 8vo; 6th ed., 1834, 3 vols. 8vo; 7th ed., 1841, r. 8vo. See also a biographical account of Archbishop Magee in Dublin University Magazine, xxvi. 480–493, xxviii. 750–767, (Gallery of Illustrious Irishmen, No. 15.) In 1820, Bristol, 8vo, Dr. Lant Carpenter pub. An Examination of Archbishop Magee's Charges against Unitarians, (in the work on the Atonement.) George Stanley Faber's Treatise on the Origin of Expiatory Sacrifice was addressed to Dr. Magee. The work of the latter on the Atonement and Sacrifice has elicited the warmest commendation from learned authorities:

"This is one of the ablest critical and polemical works of modern times. Archbishop Magee is truly a malleus hereticorum. He is an excellent scholar, an acute reasoner, and is possessed of a most extensive acquaintance with the wide field of argument to which his volumes are devoted."—Orme's Bibl. Bib.

Mr. Orme, however, objects to the plan of the work and to the "spirit of stern severity occasionally discovered."

"Dr. Magee was fully competent to the task which he undertook as the opponent of Socinianism, and has rendered perfectly nugatory every argument against the atonement of Christ, whether deduced from metaphysical principles or Biblical criticism. His spirit, indeed, cannot be always commended; but he has embodied in these volumes an astonishing mass of information, with which every theological student should render his mind familiar."—Williams's C. P., 5th ed., 1843, 358.

"An able and satisfactory defence of the doctrine."—Bickersteth's C. S., 4th ed., 1844, 482.

"A work of the highest order of merit."—Goodhugh's E. C. Lib. Man., 14.

"Discovers such deep research, yields so much valuable information, and affords so many helps in the refutation of error, as to constitute a most valuable treasure of Biblical learning, of which every Christian scholar ought to be possessed."—Lon. Chris. Observer.

Dr. Horne remarks of this work and Dr. J. Pye Smith's Scripture Testimony to the Messiah,

"Each of these truly-valuable works was published in defence of that cardinal doctrine of the Christian revelation,—the supreme Deity of our Lord and Saviour Jesus Christ; but they claim a distinct notice in this place, on account of the very numerous philological and critical explanations of important passages of Scripture which they contain. From frequently consulting them, the writer of these pages can with confidence state that they are works of which the student will never regret the purchase: each contains most valuable matter peculiar to itself; and together they form the most elaborate defence and proof of the deity of Jesus Christ extant in our language. The value of Archbishop Magee's and Dr. Smith's works is enhanced by their learned vindication of many important passages of the Sacred Scriptures from the erroneous interpretation of the modern Socinians, as well as the recent neological commentators of Germany."—*Bibl. Maginn, William, LL.D., 1794–1842, a native of Cork, Ireland, one of the most eminent scholars of modern times, entered Trinity College, Dublin, in his tenth year; conducted a school at Cork (formerly kept by his father) from 1813 to '23; removed to London in 1823, and henceforth devoted himself exclusively to those literary pursuits which had long divided his attention with the duties of his profession. He commenced writing for the London Literary Gazette in 1818; in September of the same year sent his first communication to Blackwood, (Mrs. McWhirter's Chaunt—The Powldoodies of Burran—in Christopher in the Tent;) was appointed junior editor of the London Standard in 1829; and, in conjunction with Hugh Fraser, projected and established Fraser's Magazine in 1830. He also contributed to the London Quarterly, Bentley's Miscellany, the first and second volumes of Punch, the Literary Souvenir, and other Annals, &c.; pub. Whitehall, or The Days of George IV., a Romance in 1827; and commenced a novel entitled John Manesty, the Liverpool Merchant, completed by Charles Ollier, and pub. in 1844, 2 vols. p. 8vo. An excellent biographical account of this brilliant writer, by R. Shelton Mackenzie, D.C.L., is prefixed to Maginn's Fraserian Papers, N. York, 1857, lx.–ex.; another, by Edward Vaughan Hyde Kenealy, appeared in the Dublin University Magazine, xxiii. 72–101; and other sketches of his life and writings will be found in the Irish Quarterly Review, ii. 593; Fraser's Mag., ii. 716 and xxvi. 377; and in the Lon. Gent. Mag., 1842, Pt. 2, 435. See also Index to R. S. Mackenzie's ed. of Noctes Ambrosianæ, N. York, 1855, 5 vols. 12mo. A collection of the scattered papers of Maginn was long a desideratum with the reading-public; but, with the exception of a selection of the Homeric Ballads, injured by the alterations of the editor, pub. in London in 1849, fp. 8vo, no such collection was attempted.

"We hope to see," says Lockhart, a few months after Maginn's death, "some collective publication of Dr. Maginn's learned and witty essays in verse and prose scattered over our monthly Magazines during nearly a quarter of a century. We are sure that enough might be selected to establish for his name a distinguished place in English literature."—Lon. Quar. Rev., lxxii. 86, n.

"Why are not his essays collected?" inquires the sprightly Mrs. Thomson. "Who holds them back from an expectant public? He wrote when our periodical literature was in its zenith; yet he bore away the palm; and his clear, firm hand might be discerned amid a host of inferior writers. There was no mistaking that emphatic, pure, and stately English of his. No modern writer in periodicals has ever given to satire a less repulsive form of personality. No private venom seemed to direct the powerful pen which spared not Affectation and lashed Presumption till she bled to death."—Mrs. Thomson's Recollections of Literary Characters, 1854, i. 4.

"We prophesy," says a writer in Fraser's Magazine, "that, when these disjecta membra poetæ shall have been brought together, they will make a more original, learned, and amusing series of essays and poems than those of any other literary man of the present day. They will be found to contain much of singularly-curious matter on all subjects,—poetry, politics, classics, history, and antiquities,—which all in turn occupied the attention and derived additional ornament and light from the genius of him who is, alas! no more."

"Romancist, parodist, politician, satirist, linguist, poet, critic, scholar," remarks Jerdan, "pre-eminent in all, and in the last all-but universal, the efflux of his genius was inexhaustible; and, were even the approach to a considerable collection of his productions accomplished, I am convinced that the world would be more than ever astonished by the originality, learning, fancy, wit, and beauty with which he illuminated the widest circle of periodical literature."

Maginn's faithful friend Kenealy, who was much with him in sorrow and in joy, who ministered to his necessities in sickness and in poverty, and who closed his eyes in death, projected the preparation of a collection of his fugitive essays:

"Their variety," he remarks, "proves the amazing versatility of his mind; their excellence is an emblem of its wealth and beauty. Poetry, romance, and criticism, parody, translation, and burlesque,—of these there are enshrined, amid the vast collection of his compositions, examples as perfect and splendid as any in the language, and such as if presented to the world at one view could not fail to astonish, to gratify, and to instruct it."—Dubl. Univ. Mag., xxiii. 72.

But, for various reasons, this design was never carried out. Obliged himself to relinquish this favourite project, Kenealy was greatly delighted when Dr. R. S. Mackenzie informed him of his intention to present to the world a portion at least of these brilliant effusions:

"Seeing no hope of a republication of his writings in this country," he writes to Mackenzie, "I dismissed the matter wholly from my thought, but not without regret that no such monument should be raised to his fame and memory. I am delighted that it has fallen into such competent hands as your own to collect his works for the great American people, and I have no doubt it will far exceed any thing of the kind I could do. . . . You have a glorious opportunity to edit a rare work, where you have no fear of libel before your eyes. Maginn's best things can never be republished here until all his victims have passed from the scene."—Mackenzie's Memoir of Maginn: Preface to the former's ed. of Noctes Ambrosianæ, N. York, 1855, xii.

Mackenzie accordingly pub. in New York (1855–57) Maginn's Miscellanies, 5 vols. 12mo,—viz.: I., II. Odoherty's Papers; III. Shakspeare Papers; IV. Homeric Ballads; V. Fraserian Papers, with Life of the author prefixed. The editor's notes present a choice body of biographical, anecdotical, and critical matter, executed with his usual erudition, good sense, and good taste.

"For more than a quarter of a century," remarks Mackenzie, "the most remarkable magazine-writer of his time was the late William Maginn, LL.D., well known as the Sir Morgan Odoherty of Blackwood's Magazine, and as the principal contributor for many years to Fraser's and other periodicals. The combined learning, wit, eloquence, eccentricity, and humor of Maginn had obtained for him, long before his death, (in 1842,) the title of THE MODERN RABELAIS. His magazine-articles possess extraordinary merit. He had the art of putting a vast quantity of animal spirits upon paper; but his graver articles—which contain sound and serious principles of criticism—are earnest and well reasoned. . . . Few men were equal to him in conversation, though he was the reverse of a great talker. It was the variety of topics upon which he threw a light, and not the diffuseness of his remarks, which gave a happy idea of the wealth of his conversation. Meet him when you might, turn the discourse into whatever channels you pleased, Maginn was a master of every subject,—the most recondite as well as the most familiar."

"His conversation," says Kenealy, "was an outpouring of the gorgeous stores wherewith his mind was laden, and flowed on, like the storied Pactolus, all golden. Whether the subject was grave or gay, lively or severe, profound or merely elegant, he infused into it such ambrosial ichor, he sprinkled it with such sunbright wit, as if the Muse of Comedy stood invisibly by and whispered into his ear: he illumined it with so many iris-like beams of learning, originality, wisdom, and poetry, that to listen to him was like the case of one who is spell-bound by an enchanter. And yet all was so artless, so simple, so unconcernedly delivered, that it evidently required no effort of mind to enable him thus to flash forth—but that which you beheld was the ordinary lustre of his understanding."—Dubl. Univ. Mag.

It would be easy to add to these testimonies to the remarkable powers of Dr. Maginn as a scholar, a writer, and a conversationalist,—to quote Lockhart, Croker, Campbell Mackenzie, Maclise, and others of those who knew him in the library, the editor's office, and the drawing-room; but we have already indicated the sources of such biographical minutiæ, and to these our limited space obliges us to refer the curious reader.

"One of the most remarkable of that group of scholars and good fellows, ready writers, boon companions, and wits who initiated the brilliant periodical literature of this age in the British islands was William Maginn, LL.D., the youngest Doctor of Laws ever graduated at Old Trinity. . . . Every English periodical of mark for years owed somewhat of its influence and its interest to the prompt, copious, erudite, and funny pen of Maginn. Now it was a parody, and now a translation; to-day a critique, to-morrow a letter from Paris; one month a novel, and the next a political essay. Versatile, learned, apt, and facile, the genial Irish Doctor made wisdom and mirth wherever he went. Too convivial for his own good, too improvident for his prosperity, he was yet a benefactor to the public, a delight to scholars, and an idol to his friends."—HENRY T. TUCKERMAN.

We have great admiration for Robert Hall, but we should tremble for his reputation if any volume of his were subjected to such an ordeal. . . . Vols. v., vi., 1763–1780, 1851. An elaborate review of these vols., by Mr. J. G. Palfrey, will be found in the North American Review (vol. lxxv.) for July, 1852, 125–208. Mr. Palfrey finds much to commend and something to censure:

"Our readers have seen some proofs that Lord Mahon is not eminently good at weighing authorities, or even sufficiently careful in his citations of them. It is painful to see how he sometimes disposes of such an authority as that of our learned countryman Mr. Sparks, a writer to whom American history is much more indebted than to any other for fruits of original research. With great respect for Lord Mahon's character and labors, but with greater respect for the truth of history and for the principles of a generous criticism, we have felt bound to present some of his errors to his notice."—185, 208.

See a review of these volumes in Lon. Athenæum, 1851, 1342–1344; 1852, 7–10, 46–49, 920–934. Lord Mahon charged Mr. Sparks (Appendix, vol. vi.) with having omitted certain passages in some of Washington's letters, with having altered others, and with having added matter not in the originals. These charges elicited from Mr. Sparks (I.) A Reply to the Strictures of Lord Mahon and others on the Mode of Editing the Writings of Washington, 1852. This publication led to several others,—viz.: II. A letter from Lord Mahon to Mr. Sparks, being A Rejoinder to his Reply to the Strictures, &c., 1852. III. A Letter [from Mr. Sparks] to Lord Mahon, being an Answer to his Letter Addressed to the Editor of Washington's Writings, Camb., Oct. 25, 1852. IV. A Reprint [by Mr. Wm. B. Reed, of Philadelphia] of the Original Letters of Washington to Joseph Reed during the American Revolution, referred to in the Pamphlets of Lord Mahon and Mr. Sparks, Phila., Nov. 16, 1852. V. Remarks [by Mr.

Sparks] on a Reprint, &c., dated April 20, 1853. The points, management, and results of this controversy can only be learned by a reference to the publications themselves. See also Lon. Athen., 1852, 920, 934–935; Duyckinckś' Cyc. of Amer. Lit., i. 180. It is, however, only justice to Mr. Sparks to remark that the serious charge of adding to the text was promptly and honourably withdrawn by Lord Mahon when evidence convinced him that it was not tenable. To the other charges Mr. Sparks made what he seems to consider a valid defence. This is a matter on which each critic must exercise his own judgment. As regards the merits of Lord Mahon's History of England, American commendation has not lagged behind that of English criticism:

"Another merit of recent historical literature is, that it has modified what used to be called the dignity of history, and has blended with it more of the lively interest of biography. An excellent specimen of such historical composition—an accurate, calmly-tempered, and attractive history—will be found in Lord Mahon's History of England during an important part of the last century."—Henry Reed's Lects. on Eng. Lit., Phila., 1855, 259.

"There is no work that can be more safely put into the hands of the American historical student than Lord Mahon's, not only for its tolerant and philosophic views of English affairs, but as enabling a reasonable American to feel and understand how his own history appears to a generous and friendly foreign observer. Such a process is very salutary in this self-complacent meridian."—W. B. Reed: Henry Reed's Lects. on Eng. Lit., 259, n.

"Incomparably the best history of our struggle for independence that has been written by a foreigner is that of which we have the larger portion in the just-published fifth and and sixth volumes of Lord Mahor's History of England from the Peace of Utrecht, comprising the period from 1763 to 1780, from the commencement of the popular discontents until the virtual conclusion of the war."—*N. "It [vols. i.–iv.] embraces a half-century of English History distinguished for its great events and its great men, and for the influence which it has exerted upon the destinies of the world. The writer, himself one of the great lights of his age, has had access to many original sources of information, and has gathered a large amount of material which had not come within the reach of those who had occupied the same ground before him. He carries a manly and vigorous pen, and describes characters and events with historic impartiality, with graphic skill, and sometimes with remarkable beauty."—Amer. Lit. Mag.

"The publication of such a book as this of Lord Mahon's is at all times a source of pleasure. The book itself, apart from its subject, has qualities which ought to render it generally acceptable. It is a clear, lucid narrative, written in a calm, placid stream, deriving no interest from exaggeration, but simply giving what it is evident its author desires to be a fair and candid estimate of every person who comes under his notice."—*Lon. The well-known, or rather the often-quoted, documents formerly deposited in the Scotch Library of Paris have been laid under contribution by his lordship:

"The Stuart Papers, since Walpole wrote, have been carefully examined by Lord Mahon for his valuable 'History of England from the Peace of Utrecht to the Peace of Versailles.' "—Peter Cunningham's ed. of the Letters of Horace Walpole, 1857, &c.

"Lord Mahon," says Sir Archibald Alison, "has brought to the arduous task of continuing Hume's History through the eighteenth century the taste of a scholar, the liberality of a gentleman, and the industry of an antiquarian."—Hist. of Europe, 1815–52, chap. v.

"But his History of England is 'Memoires pour servir à l'histoire,' rather than history itself. We want, in his pages, the general views drawn from particular facts, the conclusions applicable to all ages, which mark the philosophic historian. His volumes will always occupy a distinguished place in English literature, and will prove of essential service to every succeeding writer who may undertake to treat of the period which they embrace; but the mantle of Hume is destined to fall on other shoulders."—Sir Archibald Alison's Essays, Edin. and Lon., 1850, iii. 325; from Blackw. Mag., March, 1845.

"Lord Mahon's History," remarks Mr. George S. Hillard, one of the most accomplished of American critics, "is a well-written work, showing a careful examination of original authorities, and marked by a sound and discriminating judgment. Though the author's politics are those of the tory party, he is candid to those who hold different views. His strong sense of the greatness of Washington is, especially, most honorable to him."

From his lordship's admirable portrait of Washington we quote a few lines, and the quotation will not be thought irrelevant to our sequel:

"Not a single instance, as I believe, can be found in his whole career when he was impelled by any but an upright motive or endeavoured to attain an object by any but worthy means."

But his lordship contends that the signature of Major André's death-warrant constitutes "by far the greatest—if not the only—blot in Washington's most noble career," and he expresses his belief that, ere long, the "intelligent classes" among the Americans will concur in his condemnation. These comments were reviewed at some length by a critic in the London Gentleman's Magazine for January, 1855, and were also noticed by a writer in the North American Review for the same month. Both of these writers defend the course of Washington, and dissent in the most decided terms from his lordship's verdict. But Lord Mahon's strictures were to be subjected to a more searching examination, and tried by a judge whose critical acumen, logical skill, and dispassionate judgment were well worthy of the "high argument" which employed his pen. On the 11th of May, 1857, Major Charles Biddle—a member of the distinguished American family of this name—read before the Historical Society of Pennsylvania an elaborate review of the André question and the direct and collateral issues involved in its consideration. This paper was subsequently pub. in the Collections of the Historical Society of Pennsylvania, and in several of the periodicals of the day, among others, in The Historical Magazine (Boston, Mass.) for July, 1857. The impression produced by this critique upon its readers may be estimated by the following quotations. In acknowledging a copy of Major Biddle's paper, (forwarded by the author of this Dictionary,) an eminent American historian, whose life of Washington is now passing through the press, remarks,

"I have read it with great satisfaction. It is a masterly paper; and I am happy to find myself in unison with Major Biddle in the view I have taken of the André affair in my recently-published volume of the biography of Washington, especially as he has given the subject such wide and deep investigation."—Washington Irving to the author of this Dictionary, Sunnyside, June 29th, 1857.

The London Critic of August 15, 1857, notices Major Biddle's review at some length. We give an extract:

"The Historical Society of Philadelphia has lately been occupied by the consideration of a question of some interest to us as Englishmen, namely, the execution of Major André as a spy during the great American War of Independence. In the last volume of his 'History of England,' Lord Mahon brought against the memory of Washington a very grave charge in connection with this melancholy event, terming it 'the greatest blot' upon the career of Washington. Zealous to defend the character of their hero, the Americans have very naturally been indignant at this imputation; and Major Charles J. Biddle, an eminent member of the above-named society, undertook to investigate the question and to offer the results of his researches to the society. We are not, of course, surprised that these results are altogether favourable to the American hero, but must, in justice, admit that we think that the evidence produced by Major Biddle would be sufficient to bring an English jury to the same way of thinking. . . . If every one had had their due, the traitor Arnold would have been given up, and then the Americans would have let André go free. As it was, however, Washington had no alternative: the prisoner was regularly tried before a proper tribunal, and received the fate which he had incurred. Lord Mahon owes to the memory of the great American patriot the reparation of an apology, or else he owes to his own fame as an historian a refutation of the facts upon which the Americans rely."—*Lon. "The events which these documents embrace extend over the ten years of a period most interesting in Spanish affairs generally, and having no slight influence upon those of the rest of Europe. It will find a place in every library at all connected with historical literature."—Lon. New Monthly Mag.

"A very curious volume: of small pretensions, but of sterling value: almost every passage has an interest of one kind or other; and it is obvious, from the form of the extracts, that a discreet judgment has been exercised in the selection."—Lon. Spectator.

"That Lord Mahon, after acquiring high distinction as an historical writer in his native language, should have thought of composing an historical volume of four hundred pages in French, will, no doubt, excite much wonder. The curiosity of such an attempt by a gentleman so situated is, as we have shown, unexampled among us. . . . The facts have been compiled and collected with care and fairness, and commented on, as they occur, with good sense and good feeling."—Rt. Hon. J. W. Croker: Lon. Quar. Rev., lxxi. 106–169.

6. Historical Essays, selected from Contributions to the Quarterly Review, 1848, p. 8vo: (vol. xxxii. of Murray's Home and Colonial Library.)

"A valuable addition to the Albemarle-street issue of cheap literature for all classes, consisting of articles from the 'Quarterly Review,' written by the noble lord whose name as a historian will give value to their collection in this shape."—Lon. Guardian.

"The reader who has already read in the 'Quarterly Review' the agreeable articles of Lord Mahon on Joan of Arc, Mary Queen of Scots, Montrose, Frederick the Second, and Pitt's Irish Correspondence with the Duke of Rutland, may here renew his acquaintance in a more convenient form; while those who have yet to make it have an instructive entertainment to come."—Lon. Spectator.

To the above are to be added—10. (Edited by Lord Mahon, with Notes,) The Letters of Philip Dormer Stanhope, Earl of Chesterfield, including numerous Letters now first published from the original MSS., 1845, 4 vols. 8vo; with Portraits.

"When we compare Lord Mahon's edition of these famous Letters with what we had had before, it is hardly too much to say that he has given us a new work. A very large proportion of whatever could throw light on the secret history of parties and public men in Lord Chesterfield's time—very many letters entirely—had been omitted. The lacunæ are now filled up, and the whole illustrated by notes, brief and clear, and, wherever a judgment was called for, convey that of a sagacious mind in a language as terse as the great kinsman himself could have employed."—Quar. Rev., Sept. 1845.

"Lord Mahon has performed his editorial duties with ability and discretion: no opinions are obtruded, or even insinuated, under the cover of dissertation."—Lon. Athenæum, 1845, 656–658.

Mallet, (originally Malloch,) David, 1700?–1765, a native of Crieff, Perthshire, educated at the College of Aberdeen and University of Edinburgh; settled in London in 1723; became Under-Secretary to Frederic, Prince of Wales, and a friend of Pope, Bolingbroke, and other literary characters of the day. As an author he acquired some reputation by the Ballad of William and Margaret, pub. in No. 36 of Aaron Hill's Plain-Dealer, July 14, 1727, and by the following works: 1. The Excursion; a Poem, 1728. 2. Eurydice; a Tragedy, 1731. 3. Verbal Criticism; a Poem, 1733. 4. Mustapha; a Tragedy, 1739. 5. Alfred; a Masque, (in conjunction with Thomson, the poet,) 1740. 6. Elvira; a Tragedy, 1763. Mallet pub. a collective ed. of his Works in 1759, 3 vols. 12mo. A new ed. of his Ballads and Songs, with Notes and Illustrations, and a Memoir of the Author by Frederick Dinsdale, has been pub. within the last few months, 1857, 8vo.

"This work bears on every page evidence that its preparation has been a labour of love. The facts of the poet's life have been collected with great industry, and are narrated with a brevity which contrasts strongly with the abundance of references to authorities. . . . The poems are annotated with the same care and profusion."—Lon. Notes and Queries.

"Here is a wondrous labour of love,—clear, minute, exhaustive."—Lon. Athenæum.

"As a writer he cannot be placed in any high class. There is no species of composition in which he was eminent. His dramas had their day,—a short day,—and are forgotten: his blank verse seems, to my ear, the echo of Thomson. His 'Life of Bacon' is known as it is appended to Bacon's volumes, but is no longer mentioned. His works are such as a writer bustling in the world, showing himself in public, and emerging occasionally from time to time into notice, might keep alive by his personal influence, but which, conveying little information and giving no great pleasure, must soon give way as the succession of things produces new topics of conversation and other modes of amusement."—Dr. Johnson's Lives of the Poets, Cunningham's ed., iii. 372.

"The character of Mallet having been introduced and spoken of slightingly by Goldsmith,—

"JOHNSON. 'Why, sir, Mallet had talents enough to keep his literary reputation alive as long as he himself lived; and that, let me tell you, is a good deal.'

"GOLDSMITH. 'But I cannot agree that it was so. His literary reputation was dead long before his natural death. I consider an author's literary reputation to be alive only while his name will insure a good price for his copy from the booksellers. I will get you (to Johnson) a hundred guineas for any thing whatever that you shall write, if you put your name to it.'"—Boswell's Life of Johnson, Croker's ed., 1848, r. 8vo, 257.

Malone, Edmund, 1741–1812, a son of one of the judges of the Court of Common Pleas in Ireland, was educated at the University of Dublin, called to the Irish Bar in 1767, and thenceforth devoted himself to literary society and antiquarian research. 1. Two Supplementary vols. to Johnson and Steevens's ed. of Shakspeare pub. in 1778, Lon., 1780, 2 vols. 8vo. "Malone and Steevens were two laborious commentators on the meaning of words and phrases: one dull, the other clever: but the dulness was accompanied by candour and a love of truth, the cleverness by a total absence of both. Neither seems to have had a full discernment of Shakspeare's genius."—Hallam's Lit. Hist. of Europe, 4th ed., 1854, iii. 94.

Malthus, Thomas Robert, 1766–1834, a native of Surrey, England, educated at, and Fellow of, Jesus College, Cambridge, took holy orders, and obtained a curacy in Surrey. In 1805, he was appointed Professor of Modern History and Political Economy at the East India College at Haileybury, in Hertfordshire, and held this situation until his death. 1. An Essay on the Principle of Population as it affects the Future Improvement of Society; with Remarks on the Speculations of Mr. Godwin, M. Condorcet, and other writers, Lon., 1798, 8vo; 2d ed., enlarged, 1803, 4to; 3d ed., 1807, 2 vols. 8vo; 5th ed., 1817, 3 vols. 8vo; (the Additions to this ed. were pub. separately, in 8vo;) 6th ed., 1826, 2 vols. 8vo. The publication of this work elicited an animated controversy: among the principal opponents of the Malthusian theory were THOMAS JARROLD, (see p. 955 of this Dictionary,) M. T. Sadler, and John Weyland.

"This work made, when published, a powerful impression, and was supposed, for a while, to have exhausted the important department of the science of which it treats. It had, however, but few claims to attention on the score of originality, the fundamental principle maintained by Mr. Malthus—that population never fails, without any artificial stimulus, to rise to the level of subsistence—having been already set in the clearest point of view by a great number of the most eminent writers. But Mr. Malthus did not stop here," &c.—McCulloch's Lit. of Polit. Econ., 1845, 259, q. v.

"Let us look at the copious induction from the past and actual history of mankind upon which Malthus established his general theory of the causes which have retarded the natural progress of population."—Hallam's Lit. Hist. of Europe, 4th ed., 1854, ii. 424.

"Mr. Malthus published his essay in June, 1798; and, in the revolutionary state of the world at the time, the importance of the principle on which he depended was instantly perceived, and it has formed the groundwork of the reasonings of all intelligent men on the affairs of mankind ever since."—Prof. Smyth's Lects. on the Hist. of the French Revolution, 1855, ii. 228. See also pp. 226, 227, 427.

"It was said by a person well qualified to judge, both from strength and candour of mind, that 'it would take a thousand years at least to answer Malthus's work on population.' . . . It may be almost doubted whether Mr. Malthus was in the first instance serious in many things that he threw out, or whether he did not hazard the whole as an amusing and extreme paradox, which might puzzle the reader as it had done himself in an idle moment, but to which no practical consequence whatever could attach."—Hazlitt's Spirit of the Age: Mr. Malthus. q. v.

"While everybody was abusing and despising Mr. Godwin, and while Mr. Godwin was, among a certain description of understandings, increasing every day in popularity, Mr. Malthus took the trouble of refuting him; and we hear no more of Mr. Godwin."—Works of the Rev. Sydney Smith, 1854, i. 16.

"Though a very sagacious writer in general, he [Malthus] omitted the influence of free trade, which puts all the world at the command of an increasing and producing people."—JOHN HILL BURTON: Rich's Cyc. of Biog., 1854.

"Who is the real parent of the blind and heartless delusion of the New Poor-Law Bill? Malthus."—SIR ARCHIBALD ALISON: Essays, 1850, ii. 425.

"Notwithstanding this fundamental error, [respecting population,] Malthus was a great political philosopher, and the very promulgation of his error was an important step in the advance to truth."—Alison's Hist. of Europe, 1815–1852, chap. v.

Southey had a great antipathy to Malthus's doctrines, and reviewed his Essay on the Principle of Population in the Annual Review, (Aikin's,) vol. i., 1804. In his letters to his friends we find, every now and then, expressions of his disgust at the views of the political economist:

"By-the-by," he writes to Coleridge, June 11, 1804, "that fellow has the impudence to marry, after writing upon the miseries of population."

Again, in a letter to Henry Taylor, May 3, 1830, he writes:

"I hold with Wilmot Horton about emigration, and think Sadler erroneous in his opinions upon the law of primogeniture; but in the main his book is a most important one. He has trampled upon Malthus's theory, proving its absurdity and falsehood, and his own views of the law of population deduce from facts that it is what from feeling you would wish it to be." "The two first chapters are entirely rewritten, and a great variety of fresh matter is everywhere introduced. But there is no change in the principles, except in the assumption that labour is a constant measure of value, and of this he had given the public notice as far back as 1823. . . . Malthus's friend, the Rev. Sydney Smith, pays a glowing tribute to his memory:

"I cannot read the name of Malthus without adding my tribute of affection for the memory of one of the best men that ever lived. He loved philosophical truth more than any man I ever knew, was full of practical wisdom, and never indulged in contemptuous feelings against his inferiors in understanding."—Smith's Works, 1854, i. 16, n.

The laborious political economist seems to have gained more fame than profit by his anxious speculations:

"September 14, 1820.—Called on Gallois, [in Paris.] Told me his surprise at hearing from Malthus that all his works had not brought him more than a thousand pounds. It seemed to him that the English character must have a good deal changed, to prize works of imagination so much more than those of depth and utility."—Thomas Moore's Memoirs, &c., 1853, iii. 148.

"The fallacy of that book is, that Mandeville defines neither vices nor benefits."—DR. JOHNSON: Boswell's Life, 1848, r. 8vo, 594, q. v.

"With respect to his capital and offensive paradox, that private vices are public benefits, Mandeville's whole art consists in denominating our passions by the appellation assigned to their vicious excess, and then proving them, under this denomination, useful to society. There is a lively force, and caustic though coarse wit, in his performance, which occasionally reminds one of Paine."—Green's Diary of a Lover of Lit., Ipswich, 1810, 4to, 97.

"Strange composition it is,—strong, masculine style. It may impugn a dignitary of the church to say so, but his style reminds us of Paley. . . . Nobody would be the better for reading Mandeville, whose theory, being founded on a false and degrading base, has naturally and inevitably fallen into complete neglect. . . His theory, that the whole of society is benefited by the vices of some, is not worth combating; for, if you allow the ill conduct of one man to be advantageous, why not two, or twenty, or twenty thousand? What is to define the bounds of private life to which he would confine his vice? What is society, that vague generality, made up of but private lives en masse? The singularity of his book, and what made it read when it appeared, is the homely sort of coarse eloquence which seemed to take plain common sense for his mode, and, building on absurdity, to argue in the most rational manner."—Portfolio of a Man of the World, in *Lon. "Observe the writings of Rochefoucauld or Mandeville: you will there see what I am describing, [the sophistical mixture of truth and falsehood,]—as, indeed, you may in every work where the author is deceived himself or is deceiving others."—Prof. Wm. Smyth's Lects. on Mod. Hist., Lect. V.

"If Shakspeare had written a book on the motives of human actions, it is by no means certain that it would have been a good one. It is extremely improbable that it would have contained half so much able reasoning on the subject as is to be found in the Fable of the Bees. But could Mandeville have created an Iago? Well as he knew how to resolve characters into their elements, would he have been able to combine those elements in such a manner as to make up a man, a real, living, individual man?"—LORD MACAULAY: Crit. and Hist. Essays, 1854, i. 7.

Professor Mandeville's reading-books are in use in many of the schools of the United States. We have a number of certificates to their excellence before us.

Mandeville, Mandevile, Mandeyyll, Mandeuyll, Maundeuyle, Maundevile, Maundeville, Sir John De, 1300?–1372, a native of St. Alban's, travelled in Oriental countries from 1327 to '60, and, after resting for a period in England, returned to the Continent and settled at Liege, where he remained until his death. He wrote an account of his travels in Latin; from which he translated it into French, from French to English, and into Italian. It has also been pub. in Spanish, Belgic, and German. The first printed ed. is supposed to have been the Italian one of Pietro de Cornero, Milan, 1480, 4to; the first English ed. was pub. 1499, 8vo; the best of the old English eds. is that of 1725, 8vo. A new ed. was pub. by J. O. Halliwell, 1839, 8vo: Voiage and Travaile, which treateth of the Way to Hierusalem, and Marvayles of Ynde, with other Llands and Countryes; from Cottonian MSS.; collated with seven MSS. and old printed editions, with Introductions, Additional Notes, and Glossary, pp. xii., 325; with a Frontispiece, Title, Vignette, and seventy Fac-Similes of the old and grotesque wood-cuts from the earlier editions and MSS. in the British Museum. As Mandeville has the reputation of being the first English prose writer, a specimen of his language will not be uninteresting:

"For als moche as the Londe bezonde the See, that is to seye, the Holy Lond that Men calle the Land of Promyssioun, or of Beheste passynge alle othere Londes, is the most worthi Lond, most excellent, and Lady and Sovereign of alle othere Londes, and is blessed and halewed of the precyous Body and Blood of oure Lorde Jesu Christ; in the whiche Londe it lykede him to take Flesche and Blood of the Virgyne Marie, to envyrone that Holy Lond with his blessede Feet; and there he wolde of his blessednesse enoumbre him in the seyd blessed and gloriouse Virgin Marie, and become—"

"Although so interesting, and particularly so as being the first English prose work, not contained in any of the collections of Voyages." See Retrospective Review.

"In the time of his Travaile," says Bale in his Catalogue of British Writers, "he was in Scythia, Media, Mesopotamia, Persia, Chaldæa, Greece, Ilyrium, Tartaria, and divers other Kingdomes of the World."—Hakluyt's Trans.

"Don't think any more of Independent Tartary. . . . Read Sir John Mandeville's Travels to cure you, or come over to England."—Charles Lamb to Mr. Manning, 19th Feb. 1803.

"Mandeville was the Bruce of the fourteenth century,—as often calumniated, and even ridiculed. The most ingenuous of voyagers has been considered as an idle fabulist; the most cautious, as credulous to fatuity; and the volume of a genuine writer, which has been translated into every European language, has been formally rejected from the collection of authentic travels. His truest vindication will be found by comprehending him; and to be acquainted with his character we must seek for him in his own age."—Disraeli's Amenities of Lit.: Mandeville; our First Traveller.

"Sir John Mandeville's probity remains unimpeached; for the accuracy of whatever he relates from his own personal observation has been confirmed by subsequent travellers. The view which Mr Disraeli has taken of the character of Sir John Mandeville, our first traveller,—or, rather, the first Englishman who has recorded his journeys,—is very just and accurate."—Lon. Archæologist, 1842, No. 1, 9–10.

"He is our earliest prose author of any consideration, and our very first narrator of travels."—HIPPISLEY.

"With all extravagant credulity, (and be it recollected that in one place he describes the site of Paradise as exactly as if he had been employed to take a trigonometrical survey thereof the day after our first parents had left it,) Sir John must have had great powers of observation, and much sagacity."—Edin. Rev., xcii. 312; and see p. 317.

"Mandeville has become proverbial for indulging in a traveller's exaggerations; yet his accounts of the countries which he visited have been found far more veracious than had been imagined. His descriptions of Cathay and the wealthy province of Mangi, agreeing with those of Marco Polo, had great authority with Columbus."—Washington Irving's Columbus and his Companions, ed. 1855, iii. 399, Appendix.

"Whatever may be the estimation in which his work is held abroad, there are certainly good proofs of its having long been favourably received at home. . . . The versions of Mandeville, even in MS., must have been numerous and widely scattered abroad."—Dibdin's Lib. Comp., ed. 1825, 416.

"Of all these [early] travellers Mandeville is by far the most likely to enjoy permanent reputation, at least with English readers: the position he occupies is honourable throughout both to himself and to his country; for he everywhere maintains the character of a gentleman, a gallant soldier and devout but candid Christian, journeying, in upright intention and complete independence, 'whither he listeth,' to gratify his curiosity and thirst for information."—Lon. Retrosp. Rev., 1821, iii. 269, 293. Read the whole of this article.

"Among all the authors of this kind our renowned countryman Sir John Mandeville has distinguished himself by the copiousness of his invention, and the greatness of his genius. The second to Sir John I take to have been Ferdinand Mendez Pinto, a person of infinite adventure and unbounded imagination."—ADDISON: Tatler, No. 254, Nov. 23, 1710.

Addison proceeds to ridicule Sir John's supposed exaggerations and "inventions;" but, as we have seen above, the investigations of later travellers have brought the Voiage and Travaile of Mandeville into better credit than it formerly possessed.

Manley, David. English and Dutch Dictionary, Rott., 1678, 4to.

Manley, Mrs. De La Rivière, d. 1724, a native of Guernsey, where her father, Sir Roger Manley, was governor, pub. several indecent books, the best-known of which is Secret Memoirs and Manners of Several Persons of Quality of both Sexes; from the New Atalantis, an Island in the Mediterranean, Lon., 1709, 8vo; 1720, 4 vols. 12mo. This licentious satire on a number of distinguished persons who promoted the Revolution of 1689 produced a great sensation, and both printer and publisher were seized by a warrant from the office of the Secretary of State. Mrs. Manley was the author of a number of plays and political pamphlets, and some poetical pieces. "I honor beyond all common names of respect the distinguished gentleman [Horace Mann] who for twelve years has devoted the uncommon powers of his mind and the indomitable energy of his character to this noble cause. He will be remembered till the history of Massachusetts is forgotten, as one of her greatest benefactors."—Hon. Edward Everett: Orations and Speeches, 1853, ii. 618.

"There is not a town nor a school-district in Massachusetts where his influence has not been felt; there is not one which has not largely profited by the spirit which he has excited and by the improvement which he has introduced."—Francis Bowen: N. Amer. Rev., lx. 225.

"From the earliest day when his actions became publicly noticeable, universal education, through the instrumentality of free public schools, was commended by his words and promoted by his acts. Its advocacy has been a golden thread woven into all the texture of his writings and his life. One of his earliest addresses was a discourse before a county association of teachers, almost all of whom were older than himself, and many a one of whom might have been his parent or grandparent. After he entered the profession of the law, it was his invariable practice to give legal advice and to prepare legal papers gratuitously on all matters pertaining to public education."—Livingston's American Portrait-Gallery, N. York, vol. iii., Part 3, 1854, 178–223. q. v.

Mansfield, William Murray, Lord, 1704–1793, a native of Perth, educated at Christ Church, Oxford, was called to the Bar in 1731, made Attorney-General in 1754, appointed Chief-Justice of the King's Bench, and created a Peer 1756. 1. Speech respecting the King's Letter, Lon., 1774, 8vo. 2. Treat. on the Study of the Law: containing Directions to Students written by those celebrated Lawyers, Orators, and Statesmen the Lords Mansfield, Ashburton, and Thurlow: in a Series of Letters, 1797, 8vo.

"He was so extraordinary a person, and made so great a figure in the world, that his name must go down to posterity with distinguished honour in the public records of the nation."—BISHOP HURD: Pref. to Bp. Warburton's Works.

"This gentleman had raised himself to great eminence at the bar by the most keen, intuitive spirit of apprehension, that seemed to seize every object at first glance: an innate sagacity, that saved the trouble of intense application; and an irresistible stream of eloquence, that flowed pure and classical, strong and copious, reflecting in the most conspicuous point of view the subject over which it rolled, and sweeping before it all the slime of formal hesitation and all the intangling weeds of chicanery."—Smollett's Hist. of England: Reign of George II.

"The wisdom of his decisions and unbiassed tenor of his public conduct will be held in veneration by the sages of the law as long as the spirit of the constitution, and just notions of equity, continue to have existence."—Political Characters, 1777.

"Lord Mansfield's is a character above all praise,—the oracle of law, the standard of eloquence, and the pattern of all virtue both in public and private life."—BISHOP NEWTON.

"Beyond the Atlantic," remarks Lord Campbell, from whom we quote the preceding extracts, "the reputation of Mansfield is as high as in his own country, and his decisions are regarded of as great authority in the courts at New York and Washington as in Westminster Hall. The following tribute to his memory is from Professor Story, one of the greatest jurists of modern times."—Lives of the Chief-Justices.

See Story's Miscell. Writings, Bost., 1852, 113, 114, 115, 119, 205, 206, 207, 208, 211, 268, 275, 277; his Equity Jurisprudence, 6th ed., 1853, i. 58–59, and 59, n.; N. Amer. Rev., xx. 64, (by Judge Story.)

"It cannot be denied that the progress of improvement was slow, and that the genius of Lord Mansfield, by outstripping that of the age at least half a century, accomplished, with brilliant success, what a few may have ventured to hope for but no one before him was bold enough to execute."—JUDGE STORY: Progress of Jurisprudence: Miscell. Writings, 208.

John Quincy Adams, in a letter to Judge Story, Nov. 4, 1829, expresses a much less favourable opinion of Lord Mansfield than his correspondent entertained. See Story's Life and Letters, 1851, ii. 20–21.

"The Reports of Burrow, Cowper, and Douglass contain the substance of Lord Mansfield's judicial decisions; and they are among the most interesting reports in the English law. . . . We should have known but very little of the great mind and varied accomplishments of Lord Mansfield if we had not been possessed of the faithful reports of his decisions. It is there that his title of the character of 'founder of the Commercial Law of England' is verified."—1 Kent Com., i. 541, 549, 8th ed., 1854.

"I have striven in this memoir to enable his admirers to follow the counsel given by Tacitus in concluding the Life of Agricola: 'Ut omnia facta dictaque ejus secum revolvant, famamque ac figuram animi magis quam corporis complectantur.' I wish I could venture to add, 'Quicquid ex eo amavimus, quicquid mirati sumus, manet mansurumque est in animis hominum, in æternitate temporum, famâ rerum.'"—LORD CAMPBELL: Lives of the Chief-Justices.

"Lord Mansfield may be truly said to be the founder of the commercial law of this country. We all know that, from his time, the great study has been to find out some certain general principles, which shall be known to all mankind, to rule not only one particular case, but to serve as a guide for the future. Most of us have heard those principles stated, reasoned upon, enlarged, and explained, till we have been lost in admiration at the strength and stretch of human understanding."—MR. JUSTICE BULLER: Case Lickbarrow v. Mason.

"The sharp-sighted man—such an one was Lord Mansfield—takes in the object, with all its relations and consequences, at a glance; and so quick is his distinguishing faculty that the act of conception and judgment seems almost to be formed and executed at the same instant."—PHILLIPS: Stu. Leg. Ra., pp. 10, 11.

"He excelled in the statement of a case. One of the first orators of the present age said of it 'that it was of itself worth the argument of any other man.'"—CHARLES BUTLER: Horæ Subsec., pp. 207–208.

See also Charles Butler's Reminiscences.

"That glory of our profession, Lord Mansfield."—Warren's Duties of Attornies, &c., 1851, 183.

"His parliamentary eloquence never blazed into sudden flashes of dazzling brilliancy, but its clear, placid, and mellow splendour was never for an instant overclouded. . . . In the House of Peers, his [Chatham's] utmost vehemence and pathos produced less effect than the moderation, the reasonableness, the luminous order, and the serene dignity which characterized the speeches of Lord Mansfield."—LORD MACAULAY: Essays, 1854, ii. 27, iii. 536. See also ii. 37, iii. 163.

"If we possess hardly any remains of Lord Mansfield's speeches at the bar or in Parliament, we have considerable materials from which to form an estimate of his judicial eloquence. The Reports of Sir James Burrow are carefully corrected, to all appearance,—probably by the learned judges themselves. Many of the judgments of the chief-justice are truly admirable in substance as well as composition; and upon some of the greater questions his oratory rises to the full height of the occasion."—LORD BROUGHAM: Statesmen of the Time of George III., ed. 1855, i. 194–214. See also ii. 96.

"Lord Mansfield was one of the most illustrious orators, statesmen, and magistrates of the eighteenth century. His mind was calm, luminous, and orderly; his temper was mild; his character had a composed dignity; his understanding was acute; his taste was most purely elegant; and the vigorous reason which he exercised rather exclusively on his own profession was adorned by all the graces of polite literature."—Sir James Mackintosh: Life, vol. ii. chap. iii.

> More silent far, where kings and poets lie;
> Where Murray, long enough his country's pride,
> Shall be no more than Tully or than Hyde."

"The object of this volume is to present a familiar exposition of the nature and habits of some of those invisible beings which people our lakes and streams, in the hope that, by placing them in a striking point of view, and describing them as much as possible in language divested of scientific terms, the subject may be made

"The object of this volume is in the highest degree commendable, nd the name of the author is guarantee sufficient for its correct and greeable treatment. Dr. Mantell's dea is a happy one."—Chambers's Journal, in Boston Living Age, . 157.

Dr. Mantell contributed, (in 1824,) to Horsfield's Hist. of Lewes, The Natural History of the District, and the geological portion of Brayley and Britton's Hist. of the County of Surrey. To Yale College he bequeathed his geological drawings; and they were within the last few months deposited in the Geological Cabinet of that institution. In 1839, he disposed of his geological collections to the British Museum for £5000. A biographical notice of this eminent geologist will be found in the Lon. Gent. Manton, Thomas, D.D., 1620–1677, a native of Laurence-Lydiard, Somersetshire, educated at Wadham College and Hart Hall, Oxford, was admitted to deacons' orders by Bishop Hall, but took no further orders in the Church; presented to the living of Stoke-Newington, 1643; Rector of St. Paul's, Covent Garden, 1650; received episcopal institution, 1661; resigned, 1662, on account of the Act of Conformity. A collective ed. of his works was pub. in 5 vols. fol., 1681–84–89–93–1701, with Life of the Author by Dr. Wm. Harris. These vols. do not contain all of his works; but a complete list will be found in Darling's Cyc. Bibl., vol. i. 1953–1956. Of his works, which consist almost entirely of sermons, the following are the best-known: 1. Comment on the Epist. of St. James, 1651, 4to; new ed., edited by Rev. J. Sherman, 1840, r. 8vo. Edited by T. M. Macdonough, abridged, 1842, 8vo; 1844, 8vo.

2. On John xvii.

"A sound and elaborate work, and, to those who can improve excellent thoughts abstracted from the modern mode of composition, a rich treasure."—Williams's C. P.

3. On 2 Thess. ii., 1679, 8vo.

"A full exposition, in the good spirit of the author."—Bickersteth.

4. Prac. Comment. on Jude, 1658, 4to; new ed., 1838, 8vo.

"Like Manton's other works, very valuable."—Bickersteth's C. S.

"The matter of these sermons is spiritual, and speaks one intimately acquainted with the secrets of wisdom. He writes like one that knew the Psalmist's heart and felt in his own the sanctifying power of what he wrote."—Vincent Alsop.

"I cannot but admire the fecundity and variety of his thoughts, that, the same things so often occurring in the verses of this Psalm, yet by a judicious observing the different arguments and motives whereby the Psalmist enforces the same requests, or some other circumstances, every sermon contains new conceptions and proper to the text."—Dr. William Bates.

"I think Manton's Commentary on the CXIX. Psalm very useful to Christian students, evangelical and practical, and well calculated to open out to the reader the fulness of that rich portion of God's word."—E. Bickersteth, Dec. 9, 1841.

"One of the richest storehouses of practical divinity in the English language."—Lon. Wesleyan Method. Mag.

"Of the five folio volumes of which his principal works consist, that containing his Sermons on the CXIXth Psalm is unquestionably the best."—Lon. Congreg. Mag., Feb. 1842.

Some of Manton's sermons will be found in the Morning Exercises at Cripplegate, St. Giles-in-the-Fields, and in Southwark, being Divers Sermons preached A.D. 1659–1689 by several Ministers of the Gospel in or near London, [viz., Drs. Owen, Manton, Bates, Greenhill, Poole, Baxter, &c.,] 1661–90, &c., 6 vols. 4to. This work had become very rare, when, in 1844, a fifth edit., carefully collated and corrected, with Notes and Translations, was pub., under the editorial supervision of James Nichols, in 6 vols. 8vo, £3 12*s.*

"In fine, the six volumes of the Morning Exercises will give you such a variety both of matter and of talent that I could wish you not to be without them."—Cotton Mather's Preacher.

It is easy to multiply testimonies to the excellence of Manton's writings:

"One of the best preachers in England."—Archbishop Usher

"The best collector of sense of the age."—Thomas Charnock

"A clear judgment, rich fancy, strong memory, and a happy elocution, met in him, and were excellently improved by diligent study."—Dr. Wm. Bates.

"He was a man of great learning, judgment, and integrity, and an excellent, most laborious, unwearied preacher."—Richard Baxter.

"Plain, easy, unaffected; his thoughts generally well digested, but there is seldom any thing extraordinary in them. His remarks on Scripture are judicious."—Dr. Doddridge.

"He spoke as one who had a living witness within him of divine truths."—Dr. Calamy's Non-Conformist's Memorial.

"There is no part of the Holy Scriptures where the nature and evidences of true and sincere godliness are so fully and largely insisted on and delineated as in the volumes before us."—Jonathan Edwards, author of the Treatise on the Will.

"The excellence of Dr. Manton's sermons is so conspicuous that none can attempt to detract from them but it must be from ignorance or envy. Living and dying, he had that reputation for a King of Preachers that hath been reached by few."—Richard Shelton: Pref. to 5th vol., fol., 1701.

"Perhaps scarce any man of the age had more diligently studied the Scripture, or was a greater master of it."—Dr. Wm. Harris: Manton's Life, in vol. i. of his Works, fol., 2d ed., 1725, and, separately, 1725, 8vo.

"Dr. Manton, Mr. Pool, with many others whose works will speak for them ten thousand times better than the tongue of panegyric or the pen of biography."—Hervey.

"All Manton's works are worth having, especially those published by himself. He is judicious, and gives the sense fully."—Bickersteth's C. S.

"While our language lasts, Manton will continue to be a great name among our theological writers."—Lon. Evangel. Mag.

Waller, the poet, was a great admirer of our author, and used to declare that "he never discoursed with such a man as Manton in all his life."

See Manton's Life by Harris, 1725, 8vo; Calamy; Neal's Puritans; Athen. Oxon.; Wilson's Hist. of Dissenting Churches and Meetings.

We have already referred to Lord Bolingbroke (see p. 215 of this Dictionary) as a not enthusiastic reader of Manton's Sermons. His lordship, not satisfied with complaining to Pope, thus addresses Swift on the same distasteful theme:

"I resolve," he writes in 1721, "to make my letter at least as long as one of your sermons; and, if you do not mend, my next shall be as long as one of Dr. Manton's, who taught my youth to yawn, and prepared me to be a High Churchman, that I might never hear him read nor read him more."

It would have been better for his lordship if he had proved a more patient student of Manton's discourses.

Marcy, E. E., M.D., "universally regarded among the leading Homœopathists of the age, both as practitioner and author, was born in Greenwich, Mass., Dec. 9, 1815. He graduated in 1837 at Amherst College, and in 1840 at Jefferson Medical College, Phila. He has written—1. Theory and Practice of Medicine, 630 pages small octavo, pub. 1852, by Radde, New York, of which three editions of 3000 each have been printed. 2. Homœopathy vs. Allopathy, 150 pages small octavo, pub. 1854, by Radde; two editions of 3000 each. He has been editor, since 1852, of the North American Homœopathic Journal, a Quarterly Magazine of Medicine and the Auxiliary Sciences, each No. containing 200 pages octavo, now in a most flourishing condition. He edited Hahnemann's Lesser Writings, pub. 1854, by Radde. During the past ten years he has also written numerous essays on medical and chemical subjects; and his works are recognised as standard authorities here and in Europe, where his writings have been translated and extensively republished. He is a very fluent, pleasing writer, with a clear, elegant, and forcible style; and all his writings, especially his controversial papers, possess remarkable power, and evince rare learning and a most profound knowledge of medicine, chemistry, and cognate sciences. He has a most genial disposition, great gentleness and urbanity in his social and domestic relations, and no man has a larger circle of valued friends. He is universally esteemed by rich and poor, to the latter of whom he is extremely kind and affable. His consummate skill as a practitioner is a constant and general theme of eulogy among his patients, and may be best known by the fact that he has undeniably the largest, best, and most lucrative practice in the city of New York. How he has contrived to write so much amid the absorbing cares of his profession would be a marvel to those who do not know that he toils on while others sleep. He was formerly an allopathic physician; and when, after a most careful and thorough investigation, he changed his opinions, he verified his theories by extended observation in the first hospitals of Europe. He is now in his prime, and bids fair to lead a long life of usefulness."

For the above notice we are indebted to Mr. W. J. A. Fuller, of New York. We, of course, do not pretend to have any judgment upon such abstruse subjects as the differences between medical schools,—save to have recourse to either mode of practice as seldom as possible. A late clerical acquaintance of ours, who has recently left the world, characterizes Dr. Marcy as

"He seems to have become a general compiler for the booksellers, and his various works had as numerous impressions as those of Burn and Buchan in our days."—Sir S. E. Brydges: Cens. Lit., ii. 218.

"No subject, indeed, appears to have been rejected by Markham: husbandry, housewifery, farriery, horsemanship, and military tactics, hunting, hawking, fowling, fishing, and archery, heraldry, poetry, romances, and the drama, all shared his attention and exercised his genius and industry. . . . His works—now becoming scarce—are in many respects curious and interesting, and display great versatility of talent."—Drake's Shakspeare and his Times, i. 505–507.

Markland, Jeremiah, 1693–1776, a native of Childwall, Lancashire, educated at Christ's Hospital and at St. Peter's College, Cambridge, acquired great reputation by his critical annotations to Maximus Tyrius, Lysias, Demosthenes, the Supplices and the two Iphigenias of Euripides, and other learned labours. See Nichols's Lit. Anec.; Chalmers's Biog. Dict.; Bp. Warburton's Letters to Hurd; Dibdin's Introduc. to the Classics; Moss's Classical Bibliog.; Review of Markland's Euripidis Supplices, &c., in Lon. Quar. Rev., vii. 441–464, (by Peter Elmsley.)

"Of all Markland's critical writings, which are numerous, the most elaborate, as well as the most generally esteemed, is his Commentary on the Supplices of Euripides. . . . For modesty, candour, literary honesty, and courteousness to other scholars, he is justly considered as the model which ought to be proposed for the imitation of every critic."—Peter Elmsley: *Lon. Marlborough, John Churchill, Duke of, June 20, 1650–1722, a native of Ashe, Devonshire, the son of Sir Winston Churchill, belongs rather to military and political than to literary history. See Campbell, John, LL.D.; Coxe, William, No. 24; Lediard, Thomas, No. 3; Letters and Despatches of the Duke of Marlborough, 1702–1714, edited by General the Rt. Hon. Marlborough, Sarah Jennings, Duchess of, 1660–1774, a native of Holywell, a suburb of St. Alban's, exercised for many years an all-powerful influence with her royal mistress,—if indeed the title does not properly belong to the nominal subject. See all the authorities referred to in preceding article; also An Account of the Conduct of the Dowager-Duchess of Marlborough from her First Coming to Court to the Year 1710, 1742, 8vo; Hooke, Nathaniel, No. 4; The Opinions of Sarah, Duchess of Marlborough, pub. from her Original MSS., 1788, 12mo; Her Private Correspondence, &c., 1838, 2 vols. 8vo; Memoirs of, by Mrs. A. T. Thompson, 1839, 2 vols. 8vo; Lord Mahon's Hist. of England, vols. ii. and iii.; Macaulay's Hist. of Eng., vol. iv., 1855.

Lord Macaulay remarks,

"My account of these transactions [see the text] I have been forced to take from the narrative of the Duchess of Marlborough, a narrative which is to be read with constant suspicion, except when, as is often the case, she relates some instance of her own malignity and insolence."—Hist. of Eng., vol. iv. chap. xviii., n.

We are no admirer of her ladyship; but it strikes us that this comment is hardly becoming the page of the historian. Swift, indeed, tells us that the duchess was the victim of "three furies which reigned in her breast,—sordid avarice, disdainful pride, and ungovernable rage;" and Pope does not speak of her in the most respectful terms; but neither Swift nor Pope were in the habit of complimenting their enemies.

"This woman was so high-spirited, haughty, and assuming that even her husband, the conqueror in so many battles, frequently ame off less than victorious in any domestic dispute with her."—Sir Walter Scott.

Marloe, Marlow, or Marlowe, Christopher, 1565?–1593, educated at Corpus Christi College, Cambridge, became an actor and a dramatist, led a loose life, and was killed in a quarrel not of the most reputable character. A collective ed. of his works, edited by George Robinson, was pub. in 1826, 3 vols. cr. 8vo. The collective ed. of his Works edited by Rev. Alexander Dyce, D.D., 1850, 3 vols. sm. 8vo, contains the following pieces: Vol. I. Account of Marlowe and his Writings; Addenda and Corrigenda; First and Second Parts of Tamburlaine; The Jew of Malta. Vol. II. Faustus, (two texts and ballad;) Edward II.; Massacre at Paris; Dido. Vol. III. Hero and Leander; Ovid's Elegies; Epigrams; First Book of Lucan; Song; Fragment; Dialogue; In Obitum R. Manwood; Note concerning Marlowe's opinions; Portions of Gager's Dido; Specimens of Petowe's Hero and Leander; The Atheist's Tragedie; Index to the Notes. Dr. Dyce, it will be noticed, does not include Lust's Dominion, often ascribed—probably without reason—to Marlowe; and, on the other hand, great doubt has been expressed whether Marlowe was really the author of Tamburlaine the Great, and co-author with Nash of Dido, Queen of Carthage. Those who are curious in the matter can refer to the authorities indicated below, whilst we proceed to quote some opinions upon a number of the pieces just named. 1. Tamburlaine the Great, Lon., 1590, 8vo.

"Tamburlaine was ridiculed on account of its inflated style. The bombast, however, which is not so excessive as has been alleged, was thought appropriate to such Oriental tyrants. This play has more spirit and poetry than any which, upon clear grounds, can be shown to have preceded it. We find also more action on the stage, a shorter and more dramatic dialogue, a more figurative style, with a far more varied and skilful versification."—Hallam's Lit. Hist. of Europe, 4th ed., 1854, ii. 170.

See Collier's Hist. of Eng. Dramat. Poet., iii. 115–126.

2. Trans. of the Elegies of Ovid, Middleburgh, s. a., sed circa 1598, 12mo. Burnt at Stationers' Hall by command of Abps. Whitgift and Bancroft. Often reprinted. Last ed., Epigrammes and Elegies by Sir John Davies and C. Marlow, Lon., 1810? sq. 12mo: 50 copies printed. 3. The Troublesome Raigne and Lamentable Death of Edward the Second, King of England, &c., 1598, 1622, 4to.

"Edward II. is, according to the modern standard of composition, Marlowe's best play. It is written with few offences against the common rules, and in a succession of smooth and flowing lines. The poet, however, succeeds less in the voluptuous and effeminate descriptions which he here attempts than in the more dreadful and violent bursts of passion. Edward II. is drawn with historic truth, but without much dramatic effect."—Hazlitt's Lects. on the Dramat. Age of Elizabeth, Lect. II.

"The reluctant pangs of abdicating royalty in Edward furnished hints which Shakspeare scarcely improved in his Richard the Second; and the death-scene of Marlowe's king moves pity and terror beyond any scene, ancient or modern, with which I am acquainted."—Charles Lamb's Characters of Dramat. Writers Contemp. with Shakspeare.

"In Marlow's Edward the Second I certainly imagine that I can discover the feebler model of the earliest historical pieces of Shakspeare."—Schlegel's Lects. on Dramat. Art and Lit., Black's trans., 1846, 458.

"Marlowe's Life of Edward II., which was entered on the books of the Stationers' Company in 1593, has been deemed by some the earliest specimen of the historical play founded upon English chronicles. Whether this be true or not,—and probably it is not,—it is certainly by far the best after those of Shakspeare."—Hallam's Lit. Hist. of Europe, 4th ed., 1854, ii. 171.

See Blackw. Mag., ii. 21.

4. The Tragical History of the Life and Death of Dr. John Faustus, Lon., 1616, '24, '31, 4to. The obligations of Goethe to this tragedy are well known, and acknowledged by him.

"Of all that he hath written to the stage his Dr. Faustus hath made the greatest noise, with its Devils and such like tragical sports."—Phillips's Theat. Poet. Anglic., Brydges's ed., 113–114, q. v. (This criticism is especially ascribed to Milton.)

"His Life and Death of Dr. Faustus, though an imperfect and unequal performance, is his greatest work. Faustus himself is a rude sketch, but it is a gigantic one. This character may be considered as a personification of the pride of will and eagerness of curiosity sublimed beyond the reach of fear and remorse."—Hazlitt's Lects. on the Dramat. Age of Elizabeth, Lect. II.

"The growing horrors of Faustus's last scene are awfully marked by the hours and half-hours as they expire, and bring him nearer and nearer to the exactment of his dire compact. It is indeed an agony and a fearful colluctation."—Lamb's Characters of Dramat. Writers Contemp. with Shakspeare.

"It is full of poetical beauties; but an intermixture of buffoonery weakens the effect, and leaves it on the whole rather a sketch by a great genius than a finished performance. There is an awful melancholy about Marlowe's Mephistopheles, perhaps more impressive than the malignant mirth of that fiend in the renowned work of Goethe. But the fair form of Margaret is wanting; and Marlowe has hardly earned the credit of having breathed a few casual inspirations into a greater mind than his own."—Hallam's Lit. Hist. of Europe, 4th ed., 1854, ii. 171.

See Blackw. Mag., i. 388.

5. The Famous Tragedy of the Rich Jew of Malta, 1633, 4to. With Pref. by W. Shone, 1810, 8vo.

"The author seems to have relied on the horror inspired by the subject, and the national disgust excited against the principal character, to rouse the feelings of the audience: for the rest, it is a tissue of gratuitous, unprovoked, and incredible atrocities, which are committed, one upon the back of the other, by the parties concerned, without motive, passion, or object."—Hazlitt's Lects. on the Dramat. Lit. of the Age of Elizabeth, Lect. II.

"Marlowe's Jew does not approach so near to Shakspeare's as his Edward the Second does to Richard the Second. Barabas is a mere monster brought in with a large painted nose to please the rabble. He kills in sport, poisons whole nunneries, invents infernal machines."—Lamb's Characters of Dramat. Writers Contemp. with Shakspeare.

"The first two acts of the Jew of Malta are more vigorously conceived, both as to character and circumstance, than any other Elizabethan play, except those of Shakspeare; and perhaps we may think that Barabas, though not the prototype of Shylock,—a praise of which he is unworthy,—may have suggested some few ideas to the inventor. But the latter's acts—as is usual with our old dramatists—are a tissue of uninteresting crimes and slaughter."—Hallam's Lit. Hist. of Europe, 4th ed., 1854, ii. 170, and 170, n.

See Blackw. Mag., ii. 260, iii. 208.

Marlowe's plays are now but little known to the reader; but a few verses, which were perhaps but lightly esteemed by the author, have preserved his name in the memory of thousands:

"Every one is familiar," says Mr. Hallam, "with the beautiful song of Marlowe, 'Come live with me, and be my love,' and with the hardly less beautiful answer ascribed to Raleigh."—Lit. Hist. of Europe, 4th ed., 1854, ii. 125.

Marlowe and George Chapman's Hero and Leander was repub., with a Critical Preface by S. W. Singer, 1821, 12mo.

> "What mortall soule with Marlo might contend,
> That could 'gainst reason force him stoope or bend?

> Henry Petowe, (1598.)

"Kit Marlowe is, beyond comparison, the finest of the neglected poets."—Hibbert.

This quotation will probably remind the reader of an ancient couplet:

> "Marlowe, renowned for his rare art and wit,
> Could ne'er attain beyond the name of Kit."
> Thomas Heywood.

"His tragedies manifest traces of a just dramatic conception; but they abound with tedious and uninteresting scenes, or with such extravagancies as proceeded from a want of judgment, and those barbarous ideas of the times over which it was the peculiar gift of Shakspeare's genius alone to triumph and to predominate."—Warton's Hist. of Eng. Poet., ed. 1840, iii. 351.

"His David and Bathsabe is the earliest fountain of pathos and harmony that can be traced in our Dramatic Poetry. His fancy is rich and his feeling tender, and his conceptions of dramatic character have no inconsiderable mixture of solid veracity and ideal beauty. There is no such sweetness of versification and imagery to be found in our blank verse anterior to Shakspeare."—Campbell's Specimens of English Poetry, vol. i. 140.

A Diary in America, with Remarks on its Institutions: 1st Ser., 1839, 3 vols. 8vo; 2d Ser., 1839, 3 vols. 8vo.

"The most readable and one of the most valuable works which has yet appeared on America. . . . As pointed in composition, as tinged with humour, and, allowing for the absence of story, as amusing, as one of his novels. In the grave and more general views it exhibits much sound sense and shrewdness."—Lon. Spec.

"The verisimilitude of the scenes and portraits he depicts is too palpable for doubt, and his proofs are too strong for denial. We admire his shrewdness and thank him for his facts: let us profit by both."—United Service Journal.

"Written in a racy, spirited, and right capital style, and cannot fail greatly to interest the clergy."—Church Mag.

"In this diary are exhibited a drollery and playfulness which blend most agreeably with the good sense and acute observation of which it is full."—John Bull.

"The pervading faults of the 'Diary in America' are its egotism and personality. The author seems to consider his arrival in the United States as an event of about as much importance in their history as the declaration of Independence,—a day

'In golden letters, to be set
Amongst the high tides in the calendar.'

The book is, indeed, much more unquestionably 'light' than 'amusing.' His style is careless and vulgar; the matter ill-arranged; the prejudice displayed strong; the reason egregiously loose and inconsequent. A better title for the work would be 'Captain Marryat in America.' "—Lon. Athen., 1840, 9–11, q. v.

"We much question, on considering the lighter parts of the present volumes, whether he could ever write a good book of ordinary travels. The only descriptions of scenery which he has introduced are of waterfalls: they are poor and tawdry. His descriptions of manners, which in one sense are so much better, are in another worse. Besides being intemperate and capricious, they frequently too much resemble the trifling of a school-boy who cannot help running away from his business to laugh over an idle story or play with a tricksy word as a kitten with its tail. A grave and philosophical subject we are sure he could never fathom."—Edin. Rev., lxx. 123–149, q. v.

We find a reference to Captain Marryat's Diary in America in the Private Correspondence of Daniel Webster:

"I must say that the good people have treated me with great kindness. Their hospitality is unbounded, and I find nothing cold or stiff in their manners,—at least not more than is observed among ourselves. There may be exceptions; but I think I may say this as a general truth. The thing in England most prejudiced against the United States is the press. Its ignorance of us is shocking; and it is increased by such absurdities as the travellers publish, to which stock of absurdities, I am sorry to say, Captain Marryat is making an abundant addition."—Letter to Mr. Ketchum, London, July 23, 1839, Bost., 1857, ii. 59.

"As a vigorous, dashing sketch of the wild life of the prairies of California, the wildernesses of the Rocky Mountains, and the swamps of Texas, 'Mons. Violet' is a work which cannot fail to command much public attention and public interest."—Court Journal.

From a number of criticisms before us on Marryat's general characteristics as a writer we give a few brief extracts:

"Captain Marryat stands second in merit to no living novelist but Miss Edgeworth. His happy delineations and contrasts of character, and easy play of native fun, redeem a thousand faults of verbosity, clumsiness, and coarseness. His strong sense and utter superiority to affectation of all sorts command respect; and in his quiet effectiveness of circumstantial narrative he sometimes approaches old Defoe."—J. G. Lockhart: Lon. Quar. Rev., lxiv. 308.

"North. 'A captain in the navy, and an honour to it; an admirable sailor, and an admirable writer; and would that he too were with us on the leads, my lads, for a pleasanter fellow, to those who know him. never enlivened the social board.'"—Noctes Ambros., No. LXVI., Blackw. Mag., xxxvi. 122.

"Mullion. 'A capital writer, sir; beats the American, Cooper, to shivers: he's only second, in fact, to Tom Cringle.'"—Noctes Ambros., No. LXIII., Blackwood's Mag., xxxii. 695.

"Captain Marryat's productions are happy in more senses than one: he employs neither the effort nor the prolixity of Cooper: his conception of character is so facile and felicitous that his personages immediately become our intimate acquaintance, and astonish us by their faithful resemblance to whole classes of beings similarly situated. Captain Marryat's humour is genuine: it flows naturally, and insensibly communicates to the reader the gaiety the author himself seems animated with."—Westminster Rev.

"His stories of the sea are unquestionably the first in their peculiar line."—Dubl. Univ. Mag., x. 326.

"The novels of Captain Marryat are the best of nautical romances."—H. T. Tuckerman.

"His books are essentially 'mediocre.' His ideas are the common property of the mob, and have been their common property time out of mind. We look throughout his writings in vain for the slightest indication of originality, for the faintest incentive to thought. His plots, his language, his opinions are neither adapted nor intended for scrutiny."—Edgar A. Poe's Literati: F. Marryat, 457.

Almost all of Mrs. Marsh's works have been pub. anonymously, and several (in addition to the above-named) are ascribed to her, which we omit in consequence of our doubts as to their true authorship. Of her novels, a number of which, as we have seen, were originally pub. in the usual form, each in 3 vols. p. 8vo, new edits. have recently been issued (1857) in Hodgson's Parlour Library, 12mo vols., 1*s.* per annum: vols. i., ii., iv., vi., viii., ix., x., xi., xii., xiii., xiv., xv., xvi., xvii., xviii. For a critique upon this lady's characteristics as an author we refer the reader to an article in Blackwood's

"The world has not been slow," concludes this critic, "to acknowledge the goodness that lies in her old-fashioned moral, nor the many indications of power and purpose which her works contain."

"His book is more than a treatise: it is as entertaining as a book of travels, and abounds in pictures from memory of life in the Desert and in the East. In the earlier chapters there are evidences of that extensive scholarship and acquaintance with many tongues for which the writer has so enviable a fame."—N. Amer. Rev., lxxxiii. 561.

"The great book of natural history, the Universe, does not contain a chapter more striking than that which is supplied by the subject of this treatise. . . . We advise our readers at home and abroad to peruse this book. . . . We do not think that three or four hours can be better spent than in its perusal."—Lon. Athen., 1856, 1017–1018.

"Mr. Marsh's acquaintance with the fine arts is very extensive, and we have few better linguists. . . . He is one of our most learned essayists, and his writings are as much distinguished for good sense and acuteness as for scholarship. They are also marked by a thorough nationality."—Griswold's Prose Writers of America, 4th ed., Phila., 1852, 42, 414.

"We trust that this contribution to our lighter literature is only the beginning of what so accomplished a translator as Mrs. Marsh intends to do."—N. Amer. Rev., lxxxiii. 548.

Marshall, John, LL.D., September 24, 1755–July 6, 1835, a native of Fauquier county, Virginia, the eldest child of Colonel Thomas Marshall, became a captain in the army of the Revolution, 1777, and took part in the battles of Brandywine, Germantown, and Monmouth; was admitted to the Bar 1780; and, after filling various public offices with great distinction, was in 1801 made Chief-Justice of the Supreme Court of the United States, and retained this important position until his death. For an account of the public life and services of this distinguished jurist the reader is referred to the biographical sketch by Judge Story in the National Portrait-Gallery of Distinguished Americans, vol. i., (originally pub. in a less complete shape in N. Amer. Rev., xxvi. 1–40, and used as the basis of A Discourse Pronounced on the 15th October, 1835, at the Request of the Suffolk Bar, on the Life, Character, and Services of Chief-Justice Marshall, pub. in Story's Miscell. Writings, 1852, 639–697;) Griswold's Prose Writers of America, 4th ed., 1852, 25, 85–88; Duyckincks' Cyc. of Amer. Lit., 1855, i. 404; Encyc. Rev., i. 83; N. York Rev., iii. 129; Amer. Almanac, 1836, 305.

Judge Marshall's claims to authorship rest upon his Life of George Washington, &c., to which is prefixed an Introduction, containing a Compendious View of the Colonies planted by the English on the Continent of North America, from the Settlement to the Commencement of that War which terminated in their Independence, Lon. and Phila., 5 vols. 4to, £7 17*s.* 6*d.*; also in 5 vols. 8vo, £2 12*s.* 6*d.* New ed., abridged, without the Introduction, Phila., 1832, 2 vols. 8vo; school ed., 1838, 12mo, pp. 379. Introduction pub. separately, 1824, 8vo.

"It could scarcely be doubted that his 'Life of Washington' would be invaluable for the truth of its facts and the accuracy and completeness of its narrative. And such has been, and will continue to be, its reputation."—Judge Story: Nat. Portrait-Gallery, vol. i.

And see N. Amer. Rev., xxvi. 1–40.

"Marshall and Sparks are very accurate. Whoever will read the Life by Marshall, and Correspondence by Sparks, will have a good idea of Washington."—Washington Irving, in a conversation with the author of this Dictionary.

"After the able, accurate, and comprehensive work of Chief-Justice Marshall, it would be presumptuous to attempt a historical biography of Washington."—Jared Sparks: Pref. to his Life of Washington.

"In 1804, he [Marshall] published the Biography of Washington, which, for candour, accuracy, and comprehensiveness, will forever be the most authentic history of the Revolution."—Griswold's Prose Writers of America, 1852, 86.

"Ramsay was a fluent, graceful, and eloquent writer of history, perhaps excelling, in ease and perspicuity, Marshall, the celebrated writer of the 'Life of Washington;' a work which is highly valuable, as interweaving in the life of that great man the most material points of American history during his long and eventful career. It evinces more strength of mind and detail of research than eloquence and interest, but will always remain the first authority for that period of our annals."—Rev. Timothy Flint: Sketches of the Lit. of the United States: Lon. Athen., 1835, 803.

"To judge of the service which Mr. Sparks has rendered the country, we must compare the previous accounts of Washington's career with that which we now possess. All that is contained in Marshall is meagre and incomplete in comparison with the copious details and ample illustrations with which we are at present furnished."—George Bancroft: N. Amer. Rev., xlvi. 483.

"This work [Marshall's Life of Washington] is very authentic and accurate, except the first volume on Colonial History. It is written with great simplicity and perspicuity; but it has lost much of its interest and attraction since the appearance of Sparks's immortal work."—Chancellor Kent: Course of Eng. Read., 1853, 44.

The following critique, ascribed to one of the most eminent of American authors, is taken from the columns of the New York Evening Post:

"Marshall's Life of Washington, which is the most voluminous work yet written by an American slave-holder, is no longer read. If it bears any traces of its author's uncommon powers of mind, it is in the depths of dulness which he explored, and the rigor with which he has excluded every feature of interest which might reasonably be looked for in a life of Washington from the pen of one of his most intimate and eminent friends. As one of the earliest biographies of one of the most remarkable of men, Marshall's book may continue to occupy a place upon the shelves of our public libraries until the edition now in print is worn out. If it is ever reprinted, it will not be out of compliment to any permanent literary or historical merit which the work possesses."

For notices of the Introduction to Marshall's Life of Washington, vol. i., which treats of the Colonial History of North America, see North American Review, xxvi. 1, (by Judge Story,) lii. 83, (by William H. Prescott;) H. T. Tuckerman's Sketch of Amer. Lit., 448.

Let us now see in what manner Marshall's Life of Washington was received by English critics. In a few months after the appearance of the last volume, a notice of the work (and of Ramsay's Life of Washington) appeared in the Edinburgh Review for October, 1808. We quote the opening paragraph of this paper:

"If we are to regard the history of a good man's life as a monument which literature erects to his memory, and to consider the magnitude of the intellectual structure as sufficient to insure its celebrity and duration, the chief-justice of America must certainly be allowed to have graced the fields of literature with one of the most promising trophies ever employed to commemorate the illustrious dead. But mere bulk, we suspect, gives no durable quality to works made of words; and it is not by the space they cover that they are likely to attract the notice of mankind. Mr. Marshall must not, therefore, promise himself a reputation commensurate with the dimensions of his work; for we are greatly afraid that it may come to be superseded, and the name of Washington carried down to posterity by some less ostentatious but more tasteful and pleasing memorial."—148–149.

Whether this prediction has been fulfilled or not must be left to the reader's judgment: see preceding remarks on Dr. Spark's labours; Irving, Washington, No. 16; Sparks, Jared.

The Edinburgh reviewer proceeds—not in the most complimentary tone, certainly—to indicate alleged defects in the work under notice. This critique was one of the offences which called down upon the Edinburgh the wrath of Mr. Robert Walsh, in his well-known Appeal from the Judgments of Great Britain respecting the United States of America, &c., 1819, 8vo. Lord Jeffrey, never indisposed to take up the cudgels in a literary encounter, reviewed the Appeal in the Edinburgh Review for May, 1820:

"We have called Mr. Marshall's book," his lordship remarks, "dull and honest, accurate and heavy, valuable and tedious, while neither Mr. Walsh, nor anybody else, ever thought or said any thing else of it. It is his style only that we object to."—413; and in Jeffrey's Contrib. to the Edin. Rev., 1853, 810.

But Blackwood does not let Judge Marshall's production escape so easily:

"Washington's Life,—so called, a great heavy book that should have been called by some other name. As a lawyer—as a judge whose decisions, year after year, in the Supreme Court of the United States, would have done credit, honour, to Westminster Hall, in the proud season of English law—we must, we do revere Chief-Justice Marshall. But we cannot—will not—forgive such a man for having made such a book about such another man as George Washington. Full of power, full of truth, as the work undoubtedly is, one gets tired and sick of the very name of Washington before he gets half through these four [five] prodigious octavos, which are equal to about a dozen of our fashionable quartos; and all this without even finding out by them who Washington was, or what he has done. . . . Insupportably tiresome; and, with all his honesty, care, and sources of information from the papers of Washington, greatly mistaken several times in matters of importance."—American Writers, Nos. IV., V., vol. xvii. 57, 187.

When Judge Marshall pub., in 1824, his History of the American Colonies separately, Judge Story remarked,

"Many of those words in the former edition which were objected to by British critics, in no very kind spirit, as peculiar to America, though they exist in the writings of authors of good repute in their own country, have been sedulously removed from the text. We do not object to this, though we have had occasion to know that some criticisms of this sort have been owing more to the ignorance or petulance of the reviewers than to their sound taste or extensive acquaintance with English literature."—N. Amer. Rev., xxvi. 39.

"The life of Washington by Judge Marshall, like the life of Chaucer by Godwin, is rather a history of the period when he flourished than the real biography of the individual."—John Lambert: note to his London ed. of Salmagundi, 1811, i. 126.

"The work [Marshall's Life of Washington] is, indeed, chiefly compiled from Washington's correspondence, and a life of Washington is of course a history of the American war. To the first volume of this work I have referred you on a former occasion . . . The conclusions which you will draw from the pages of Marshall you will find much the same as those that you would derive from Ramsay. The more appropriate value of the work consists in the description of the distresses of Washington. . . . It is impossible for an English student to judge of these transactions [connected with the American Revolution] without reading Ramsay's work, or Marshall's Life of Washington."—Prof. Smyth's Lects. on Mod. Hist., Lects. XXXIII., XXXIV.

In 1839, 8vo, there was pub. in Boston a selection from the Decisions of Chief-Justice Marshall, (made by Mr. Perkins, of Cincinnati, under the advice of Judge Story,) under the title of The Writings of John Marshall, late Chief-Justice of the United States, upon the Federal Constitution, 1839, 8vo.

"His peculiar triumph was in the exposition of constitutional law. It was here that he stood confessedly without a rival, whether we regard his thorough knowledge of our civil and political history, his admirable powers of illustration and generalization, his scrupulous integrity and exactness in interpretation, or his consummate skill in moulding his own genius into its elements, as if they had constituted the exclusive study of his life. His proudest epitaph may be written in a single line,—Here lies the Expounder of the Constitution of the United States."—JUDGE STORY: Character and Services of Chief-Justice Marshall: Story's Miscell. Writings, 1852, 694.

"His opinions do not abound in displays of learning. His simplicity—a character so conspicuous in all his writings and actions—that first and highest characteristic of true greatness—led him to say and do just what was necessary and proper to the purpose in hand. Its reflected consequences on his own fame as a scholar, a statesman, or a jurist seem never once to have occurred to him. As a judge, the Old World may be fairly challenged to produce his superior. His style is a model,—simple and masculine; his reasoning direct, cogent, demonstrative, advancing with a giant's pace and power, and yet withal so easy evidently to him as to show clearly a mind in the constant habit of such efforts."—Judge Sharswood's Professional Ethics, 1855, 103, q. v.

"Who among them [the ancient Greeks and Romans] dispensed public justice and laid broad and deep the foundations of constitutional law like John Marshall?"—REV. ALBERT BARNES: Essays and Reviews, 1855, ii. 264. And see pp. 193, 194.

"The character of his mind, its patience, its calmness, its power of analysis and generalization, and the steadiness of its movements, made him peculiarly fitted for the exposition of constitutional law. Whatever rank may be assigned to him as a common lawyer, in this department he stands confessedly above and without a rival."—GEORGE S. HILLARD: Review of Judge Story's Discourse on Judge Marshall: N. Amer. Rev., xlii. 227.

To the volume above noticed the legal student must add—I. John W. Brockenbrough's Reports of Cases decided by the Hon. John Marshall, late Chief-Justice of the United States in the Circuit Court of the United States for the District of Virginia and North Carolina, from 1802 to 1833, Phila., 1837, 2 vols. 8vo. See Lieber's Polit. Ethics, 1839, ii. 283, and authorities there cited; remarks in Blackwood's Mag., xvii. 187, supra. II. Jos. Tate's Report of Chief-Justice Marshall's Opinion in the Case of Garnet vs. Macon, Richmond, 1825, 8vo.

Judge Marshall's personal appearance and manners have often been described:

"A tall, venerable man, his hair tied in a cue, according to olden custom, and with a countenance indicating that simplicity of mind and benignity which so eminently distinguish his character. I had the pleasure of several long conversations with him, and was struck with admiration at the extraordinary union of modesty and power, gentleness and force, which his mind displays."—Hon. Charles Augustus Murray's Travels in North America during the Years 1834–35–36, chap. ix.

"Marshall is of a tall, slender figure, not graceful nor imposing, but erect and steady. His hair is black, his eyes small and twinkling, his forehead rather low; but his features are in general harmonious. His manners are plain, yet dignified; and an unaffected modesty diffuses itself through all his actions. His dress is very simple, yet neat; his language chaste, but hardly elegant: it does not flow rapidly, but it seldom wants precision. . . . He has not the majesty and compactness of thought of Dr. Johnson; but in subtle logic he is no unworthy disciple of David Hume."—Judge Story to S. P. P. Fay, Esq., Washington, Feb. 25, 1808: Story's Life and Letters, 1851, i. 166–167.

"There is no man in the court that strikes me like Marshall. He is a plain man, looking very much like Colonel Adams, and about three inches taller. I have never seen a man of whose intellect I had a higher opinion."—Daniel Webster to Ezekiel Webster, March 28, 1814: Private Corresp. of Daniel Webster, 1857, i. 244.

Having thus seen Judge Marshall in court, let us follow him to church:

"I can never forget," says Bishop Meade, "how he would prostrate his tall form before the rude low benches without backs at Cool Spring Meeting-House, in the midst of his children and grandchildren, and his old neighbours. In Richmond he always set an example to the gentlemen of the same conformity, though many of them did not follow it."—Bishop Meade's Recollec. of Old Families and Churches in Virginia, 1857.

Judge Marshall's intellectual and judicial characteristics have been briefly referred to, and we have indicated the sources of further information.

"He was supremely fitted for high judicial station," remarks Colonel Benton,—"a solid judgment, great reasoning powers, acute and penetrating mind, with manners and habits to suit the purity and sanctity of the ermine; attentive, patient, laborious; grave on the bench, social in the intercourse of life; simple in his tastes, and inexorably just."—Thirty Years' View, &c. by a Senator, 1854, i. 681.

"He was a great man. I do not mean by this that among his contemporaries he was justly entitled to a high rank for his intellectual endowments, an equal among the master-spirits of the day, if not facile princeps. I go farther, and insist that he would have been deemed a great man in any age, and of all ages. . . . In short, if I were called upon to say in what he intellectually excelled most men, I should say it was in wisdom in the sense already alluded to,—a wisdom drawn from large, extensive, sound principles and various researches; a wisdom which constantly accumulated new materials for thought and action, and as constantly sifted and refined the old."—JUDGE STORY: *Character and Services of Chief-Justice Marshall: Story's Miscell. It contains much of chronological and anecdotical information. Many of the characters are authentic and ably drawn. The author, however, has fallen into the error common to contemporary biographers: he indulges throughout his work in a laudatory strain, and his praise is frequently fulsome to a fault. The book is said to be, from this very reason, rather unpopular in the profession."—Goodhugh's E. G. Lib. Man., 52.

Marston, John, a dramatist temp. Elizabeth and James I., was the author of a number of plays, poems, &c., some of which gained their author considerable reputation during his life. He contributed eight plays to the stage, viz.: 1. Antonio and Mellida; Historical Play, First Part, 1602, 4to. 2. Antonio's Revenge; Tragedy, Second Part, 1602, 4to. 3. The Insatiate Countesse; Tragedy, 1603, 4to. 4. The Dutch Courtezan; Comedy, 1603, 4to. 5. Parasitaster, or The Fawne; Comedy, 1606, 4to. 6. Sophonisba, a Wonder of Women; Tragedy, 1606, 4to.

"It is not very probable that Mr. G. Lewis ever looked into Marston; yet some of the most loathsome parts of the Monk are to be found in this detestable play."—Gifford.

7. What You Will; Comedy, 1607, 4to. 8. The Malcontent; Tragi-Com., 1604. This play, "augmented" by Marston, was originally written by John Webster. Six Tragedies and Comedies of Marston's were pub. together in 1633, 12mo; two eds. in the same year. This vol. contains, of the preceding, Nos. 1, 2, 4, 5, 6, and 7. In a vol. entitled Miscellaneous Pieces of Antient English Poesie, edited by the Rev. John Bowle, 1764, 12mo, were included Marston's Metamorphosis of Pigmalion's Image, (also, 1598, 16mo,) and certain Satyres, and the Scovrge of Villanie, (also 1599, sm. 8vo; Bibl. Anglo-Poet., £5 10*s*.) In 1856 was pub., Lon., 3 vols. fp. 8vo, The Dramatic and Poetical Works of John Marston; now first collected and edited by J. O. Halliwell.

"The edition deserves well of the public: it is carefully printed, and the annotations, although neither numerous nor extensive, supply ample explanations upon a variety of interesting points. If Mr. Halliwell had done no more than collect these plays, he would have conferred a boon upon all lovers of our old dramatic poetry."—Lon. Lit. Gaz.

Marston assisted Ben Jonson, George Chapman, and Martin, in the composition of Eastward Ho! 1605, 4to. See Chapman, George; Jonson, Ben.

Respecting the merits of Marston as a dramatic author we find wide differences of opinion:

"The most scurrilous, filthy, and obscene writer of his time."—Gifford: his ed. of Ben Jonson's Works.

How much of this compliment is to be attributed to Marston's unsparing attacks upon Gifford's prime favourite Jonson we shall not pretend to determine. Certainly, there have been more favourable judgments recorded than that just quoted; for example:

"He was free from all Obscene Speeches, which is the chief cause that makes Plays to be so odious unto most Men. He abhorr'd such Writers and their Works, and profest himself an Enemy to all such as stufft their Scenes with Ribaldry, and larded their lines with Scurrilous Taunts and Jests. So that whatsoever evon in the Spring of his Years he presented upon the private and publick Theatre, in his Autumn and Declining Age he needed not to be ashamed of."—Ep. Ded. to his Plays, 1633, 12mo.

Langbaine, writing about half a century later, quotes this compliment with evident satisfaction, and seems fully to endorse it,—adding,

"An Excellent Character! and fit for the Imitation of our Dramatists; most of whom would be thought to have thoroughly studied Horace: I could wish, therefore, that they which know him so well would call to mind and practise his Advice; which is thus exprest:

> 'Silvis deducti caveant, me judice, Fauni,—
> Ne nimiû teneres juvenentur versibus unquam,
> Aut immunda crepent, ignominiosaq; dicta.
> Offenduntur enim quibus est equus & pater & res.'
> De Arte Poetica."

Langbaine's Eng. Dramatic Poets, 1691, 347–348

The Biographica Dramatica also, referring to the commendation above noticed, (Ep. Ded. to his Plays,) remarks that "it is little more than might have been gathered from the perusal of his works." It is not to be forgotten, however, that one of Marston's Satyres—Pigmalion's Image—was ordered to be burned on account of its licentiousness. Hazlitt expresses a high opinion of Marston's literary merits:

"Marston is a writer of great merit, who rose to tragedy from the ground of comedy, and whose forte was not sympathy either with the stronger or softer emotions, but an impatient scorn and bitter indignation against the vices and follies of men, which vented itself either in comic irony or in lofty invective. He was properly a satirist. He was not a favourite with his contemporaries, nor they with him. He was first on terms of great intimacy, and afterwards at open war, with Ben Jonson; and he is most unfairly criticized in The Return from Parnassus, under the name of Monsieur Kinsayder, as a mere libeller and buffoon."—Lects. on the Dramat. Lit. of the Age of Elizabeth, Lect. III.

The Rev. Peter Hall also calls Marston

"A poet of distinguished celebrity in his own day,—no less admired for the versatility of his genius in tragedy and comedy than dreaded for the poignancy of his satire; in the former department the colleague of Jonson, in the latter the antagonist of Hall."

In the Poetaster, also, Marston is satirized by Ben Jonson under the name of Demetrius. See DECKER, THOMAS. The London Retrospective Review remarks that,

"Although little of real passion is to be found in the plays of Marston, there is a vigour, an apparent earnestness, both in his thoughts and language, which well supplies the place of the more genuine feelings of nature. He wants that delicacy of perception, that absorption of his own consciousness in the feelings of his character, without which true passion cannot be delineated. He never appears to lose himself sufficiently in the scenes which he depicts: we see too much of Marston, and too little of his heroes. This same propensity has given a coarseness to some of his characters, and an indelicacy, nay grossness, of expression to his language, which is, in our idea, totally irreconcilable with the eulogium pronounced by his bookseller. [Ep. Ded. to his Plays, supra]. . . . With strong notions of moral rectitude, he had not the slightest toleration for deviations from them, and no other resource for correcting or reforming them than to apply his satirical lash, and then he was happy,—for in this his power laid, and he felt that it did."—Retrospec. Review, 1822, vi. 113–132, q. v.

As a satirist, Marston is thus by Warton compared with Bishop Hall:

"There is a carelessness and laxity in Marston's versification, but there is a freedom and facility which Hall has too frequently missed by labouring to confine the sense to the couplet. Hall's meaning, among other reasons, is not always so soon apprehended, on account of his compression both in sentiment and diction. Marston is more perspicuous, as he thinks less and writes hastily. Hall often draws his materials from books and the diligent perusal of other satirists, Marston from real life."

Mr. Hallam thinks that Warton rates Marston at his full value, to say the least:

"Warton has compared Marston and Hall, and concludes that the latter is more 'elegant, exact, and elaborate.' More so than his rival he may be possibly esteemed; but these three epithets cannot be predicated of his satire in any but a relative sense."—Lit. Hist. of Europe, 4th ed., 1854, ii. 130.

Of our author's dramatic powers Mr. Hallam expresses a judgment as little complimentary as the opinion just quoted:

"Marston is a tumid and ranting tragedian, a wholesale dealer in murders and ghosts."—Ibid., iii. 124.

Both of these vols. will be found in Pinkerton's Collec. of Voyages and Travels. It was the perusal of No. 2 that gave Dr. Johnson a desire to visit the Hebrides.

"He [Dr. Johnson] told me that his father had put Martin's account of those islands into his hands when he was very young, and that he was highly pleased with it."—Boswell's Life of Johnson, 1848, r. 8vo, 153. And see p. 267.

It certainly was not the style of this work that Johnson admired; for on another occasion he remarked,

"There is now an elegance of style universally diffused. Now no man writes so ill as 'Martin's Account of the Hebrides' is written. A man could not write so ill if he should try. Set a merchant's clerk now to write, and he'll do better."—Ubi supra, 577.

"The late Earl of Durham succeeded in inducing the Duchess of Kent to read with her daughter the whole series of Miss Martineau's Tales in illustration of Political Economy. The knowledge that her present Majesty obtained from this source enabled her in after-years successfully to assist her ministers when free trade became the order of the day. The economical truths there contained were a sufficient answer to all the interested partisans of error.

"This elementary reading, we submit, was a beneficial thing for the nation, and quite as good a circumstance for the Crown."—Eclectic Review.

"Her volumes must be ranked, longo intervallo, as the best, the truest, the fullest and most philosophical work that has yet appeared on the social condition of the United States."—Lon. Spectator.

"Exactly the book which we might expect from Miss Martineau. Giddy, self-willed, well intentioned and ill informed. . . . She went on a book-making speculation, and has in consequence come back laden with a book, and that book laden with absurdity, and philosophy, and 'every thing else in the world,' as Mathews the comedian used to say."—*Blackw. "On one point, unfortunately, Miss Martineau could have been at no loss, from the moment of deciding to write a book of Travels in this country. America her theme, satire was to 'be her song;' the bookseller and his patrons are to be satisfied with no less than a pungent piquancy of remark, and this they stand ready to compensate with no stinted bounty."—J. Miss Martineau has for some years past resided at "the pretty little house which she built at Ambleside," and varies the studies of the library with experiments on her farm, which by their success have excited the astonishment, if not the envy, of the "local agriculturists" of the old school of her neighbourhood. Further notices of this lady and her writings will be found in Fraser's Mag., viii. 576, (with portrait:) Blackw. Mag., xxxiii. 817; Amer. Quar. Rev., xx. 216; N. York Rev., iii. 129; Bost. Chris. "When I find," she writes, "that in my own case scarcely one of Miss Brontë's statements about me is altogether true, I cannot be surprised at her biographer having been misled in other cases of more importance."

"I have not been till lately acquainted with any book (except 'Augustine's Meditations') that exactly paints all that I approve and all that I wish to be. Brainerd's Life has too much of gloom and despondency for me. But I think that the Memoirs of my beloved and honoured friend Henry Martyn come exactly to the point: and his biographer, the Rev. John Sargent, has marked it with beautiful precision in the close of that Memoir. O that all the world would study that short Memoir! It speaks what I would—if I were able—speak in the ear of every human being day and night. May God, of his infinite mercy, give me more abundantly to experience this heavenly disposition! and may all that I have written be blessed of Him to the producing of this holy disposition in others! Amen, and amen!"—REV. CHARLES SIMEON: Carus's Life, 3d ed., 1848, 365–366.

"Brainerd and Martyn," remarks the Rev. Albert Barnes, "died when scarce past the age of thirty, having done more to give permanent celebrity to their names than all that had been done by all the Cæsars."—Essays and Reviews, 1855, ii. 278.

Sir James Mackintosh had a high esteem for the good missionary:

Marvel, Ik. See MITCHELL, DONALD G.

Marvell, Andrew, M.P., 1620–1678, a native of Kingston-upon-Hull, Yorkshire, educated at Trinity College, Cambridge, was, in 1660, elected to represent his native town in Parliament, and retained this station until his death. He was in Holland and Germany between 1661 and '63, and three months after his return to England again went abroad, for two years, as secretary to Lord Carlisle, Ambassador-Extraordinary to Russia, Sweden, and Denmark. In 1657, he was made assistant to Milton, who was Latin Secretary to the Protector, enjoyed the intimate friendship of that distinguished poet, and was one of the first to recognise his genius:

"When Paradise Lost was published, it was valued but by few as no more than a lifeless piece, till Mr. Marvell and Dr. Barrow publickly espoused it, each in a judicious Poem."—Cooke's Life of Marvell, 1726.

As a member of Parliament, and as a political satirist, Marvell made himself so formidable to the Government of Charles II. that an effort was unsuccessfully made, through Lord Danby, to give him golden reasons for adherence to the king and his ministers; but Marvell had provided his dinner for the day, and asked for nothing more. The story is too well known to need repetition here. His works are now little read. The best-known of them are—The Rehearsal Transposed, 1672–73, 2 vols. 12mo, (against Samuel Parker, afterwards Bishop of Oxford;) Historical Essays on General Councils, Creeds, &c., 1674, '80, '87, 4to; 1689, 8vo; An Account of the Growth of Popery and Arbitrary Government in England, 1678, fol.; Miscellaneous Poems, 1681, fol.; A Second and Third Collection of Poems on Affairs of State, by A. M., L., and other Wits, 1689, 4to. His Works, with his Life prefixed, (a very incomplete ed., containing only his Poems and Letters,) was pub. by Cooke, 1726, 2 vols. 12mo; again, 1772, 2 vols. 12mo. A more complete ed., (containing his Poetical, Controversial, and Political Works, with many Original Letters, Poems, and Tracts, never before printed,) with a new Life of the Author, was pub. by Captain Edward Thompson, 1776, 3 vols. 4to. Even this ed. omits a defence of the celebrated divine, John Howe, whose tract on the Divine Prescience had been attacked by three antagonists. Thompson also includes some pieces which are the property of other authors. A Life of Andrew Marvell, the Celebrated Patriot, with Extracts and Selections from his Prose and Poetical Works, was pub. by John Dove, Lon., 1832, 12mo. This vol. receives but little praise from Mr. Henry Rogers, in his review of the Works of Marvell, in the Edin. Review, xcii. 70, (re printed in Rogers's Essays, i. 48.) The Rehearsal Transposed was greatly praised by the wits of the age, and certainly has this merit, that it effectually silenced Parker. Burnet says of the latter that,

"After he had for some years entertained the nation with several virulent books, he was attacked by the liveliest droll of the age, who wrote in a burlesque strain, but with so peculiar and entertaining a conduct, that, from the king down to the tradesman, his books were read with great pleasure, and not only humbled Parker, but the whole party; for the author of the 'Rehearsal Transposed' had all the men of wit on his side."

Anthony Wood remarks

"that it was generally thought, by many of those who were otherwise favourers of Parker's cause, that the victory lay on Marvell's side. . . . It wrought this good effect on Parker, that, forever after, it took down his high spirit."

Dean Swift, after referring to the oblivion which usually engulfs controversial publications, adds,

"There is, indeed, an exception when any great genius thinks it worth his while to expose a foolish piece: so we still read Marvell's answer to Parker with pleasure, though the book it answers be sunk long ago."

The critic of the Retrospective Review thinks that the prose works of Marvell,

"like the prose works of Milton, will attract the attention which, as part of the standard literature and history of our country, they so justly merit; and that day is not very far distant."—1824, xi. 174–195.

As regards his poetry, the same critic remarks,

"All the poems, however, contain more or less of poetic beauty: some, great tenderness of feeling and expression; and others, successful descriptions of nature and pastoral scenes."—Ibid., p. 174.

"As a poet," says Miss Mitford, "he is little known, except to the professed and unwearied reader of old folios. And yet his poems possess many of the finest elements of popularity: a rich profusion of fancy, which almost dazzles the mind as bright colours dazzle the eye; an earnestness and heartiness which do not always—do not often—belong to these flowery fancies, but which, when found in their company, add to them inexpressible vitality and savour; and a frequent felicity of phrase, which, when once read, fixes itself in the memory and will not be forgotten. Mixed with these dazzling qualities is much carelessness, and a prodigality of conceits which the stern Roundhead ought to have left, with other frippery, to his old enemies the Cavaliers. But it was the vice of the age: all ages have their favourite literary sins: and we must not blame Marvell too severely for falling into an error to which the very exuberance of his nature rendered him peculiarly prone. His mind was a bright garden, such a garden as he has described so finely; and that a few gaudy weeds should mingle with the healthier plants does but serve to prove the fertility of the soil."—Recollec. of a Lit. Life, chap. xl.: Old Poets.

"There are unquestionably many of his genuine poems which indicate a rich though ill-cultivated fancy; and in some few stanzas there is no little grace of expression. The little piece on the Pilgrim Fathers, entitled the 'Emigrants,' the fanciful 'Dialogue between Body and Soul,' the 'Dialogue between the Resolved Soul and Created Pleasure,' and the 'Coronet,' all contain lines of much elegance and sweetness. It is in his satirical poems that, as might be expected from the character of his mind, his fancy appears most vigorous; though these are largely disfigured by the characteristic defects of the age, and many, it must be confessed, are entirely without merit. . . . His Latin poems are amongst his best. The composition often shows no contemptible skill in that language; and here and there the diction and versification are such as would not have absolutely disgraced his great coadjutor, Milton. In all the higher poetical qualities there can of course be no comparison between them."—Henry Rogers: Edin. Rev., 79, 88 99.

"Johnson says that Milton was the first Englishman who wrote Latin verses with facility and purity. Marvell may justly claim the secondary honour of latinity, for he is little inferior in this accomplishment to Milton. The Carmina on the Dew-Drop, in our last, [vol. x. 338–340,] may be given in proof, with the following:—[Hortus.]"—Lon. Retrosp. Rev., 1825, xi. 182–185.

There is a wide difference of opinion as regards Marvell's merits as a satirist. Disraeli says that "he was a master in all the arts of ridicule; and his inexhaustible spirit only required some permanent subject to have rivalled the causticity of Swift, whose style, in neatness and vivacity, seems to have been modelled on his. But Marvell placed the oblation of genius on a temporary atlas, and the sacrifice sunk with it: he wrote to the times, and with the times his writings have passed away: yet something there is incorruptible in wit, and wherever its salt has fallen that part is still preserved."—Quarrels of Authors, in Miscell. of Lit., ed. 1840, 238, q. v.

Mr. Hallam gives a far less favourable verdict:

"We read with nothing but disgust the satirical poetry of Cleveland, Butler, Oldham, and Marvell, or even of men whose high rank did not soften their style,—Rochester, Dorset, Mulgrave. In Dryden there was, for the first time, a poignancy of wit which atones for his severity, and a discretion even in his taunts which made them more cutting. . . . Marvell wrote sometimes with more taste and feeling than was usual; but his satires are gross and stupid."—Lit. Hist. of Europe, 4th ed., 1854, iii. 484, 489.

"The mind of Dr. Mason was of the most vigorous order, his theology Calvinistic, and his piety and zeal worthy of imitation. It is said that when Robert Hall heard him preach in 1802, he exclaimed, 'I can never preach again!'"—Fish's Pulpit Eloquence, 1857, 486, q. v.

"The celebrated Dr. Mason of New York, justly regarded as one of the brightest ornaments of the Western hemisphere."—Robert Hall: Works, ii. 238.

"This heroic scholar and divine, whom I never think of without admiration of the vastness of intellectual power which God in his wisdom vouchsafes to certain mortals, was prominently acknowledged as the chieftain of the ecclesiastical brotherhood of those days. . . . His address to his people on resigning his pastoral charge of the Cedar Street Church is perhaps his greatest oratorical effort."—*Dr. John W. Mason, William, 1725–1797, an English divine who gained some reputation by his poetry, but more by the friendship of Gray, was the son of the Vicar of St. Trinity Hall, in the East Riding of Yorkshire; educated at St. John's College, Cambridge, and elected a Fellow of Pembroke College in 1747. In 1754, he took holy orders; became Rector of Aston, Yorkshire, and chaplain to the king, and at the time of his death had been thirty-two years Precentor and Canon Residentiary of York. His principal works are Elfrida, a Dramatic Poem, written on the Model of the Antient Greek Tragedy, 1752, 4to; Odes on Memory, Independence, Melancholy, and the Fate of Tyranny, 1756, 4to; Caractacus, a Dramatic Poem, written on the Model of the Antient Greek Tragedy, 1759, 4to; The English Garden, a Poem in Four Books, 1772–82, 4to; Collection of Anthems for Church Music, 1782; Secular Ode in Commemoration of the Glorious Revolution, 1688, 4to, 1788; Essays, Historical and Critical, on English Church Music, 1795, 12mo. His Memoirs of Thomas Gray, 1775, 4to, have already claimed our attention: see GRAY, THOMAS, No. 8. See also Miss Mitford's Literary Recollections, chap. xxxii.; Lon. Month. Rev., lxxviii. (1815) 384; Dibdin's Lib. Comp., 1825, 536; Lord Jeffrey's Contrib. to Edin. Rev., 1853, 186. The Plays of Elfrida and Caractacus, with a Monody on the Death of Mr. Pope, Odes, Elegies and Letters, were pub. in 1805, 8vo; and a collective ed. of his Works in 1811, 4 vols. 8vo; again, 1816, 4 vols. 8vo. From a review in the London Quarterly Review (xv. 376–387) of the literary characteristics of Mason, we quote a few comments:

"The literature of Mason has been underrated. [See GRAY, THOMAS, No. 8.] This mistake is partly owing to the absence of all parade of learning in his works, and partly, perhaps, to the gigantic erudition of his friends; but his attainments as a scholar might be far beneath those of Hurd and Gray, and, at the same time, far above those of ordinary classical scholars. He was bred, indeed, at a country school, and therefore never tried to emulate the forms of classical composition; but his taste was good. his knowledge of the learned languages not defective, and he was certainly able, without a master, to transfer 'the choral graces of Sophocles' into his own dramatic compositions. That he failed in his attempt to transplant these graces to the English stage was no imputation on his knowledge or his talents: they were copied with skill and with animation, but the genius—we may be permitted to say, the better genius—of our own drama presented an insuperable bar. Mason only failed where Milton had failed before. . . . From the first specimens which are preserved of his Muse, he appears to have been gifted by nature with the materials of a great poet: his faults were those of superfluity, not of defect; his imagination was copious to excess, his diction florid even to the confines of bombast. . . . On the Caractacus and Elfrida it would be idle to comment. The public taste has at length assigned to them the rank of beautiful dramatic poems, with much fancy, some tinsel, great classical taste, and an entire unfitness for representation. . . . In elegies and moral epistles Mason was excellent: the flow of his versification, the warmth but honest independence of his opinions, the tone of intellectual superiority which he maintains in addressing the great, the exalted sentiments of morality and religion which he generally infuses into these short but exquisite compositions. render it difficult to determine whether we are more to respect the poet or the man.

"But in the more cramped and contracted walk of sonnet and metrical epitaph, Mason reigns and triumphs. In the former he sometimes far surpasses Milton; in the latter he rivals Dryden."—380, 381–382, 383–384.

Southey remarks that the tragedy of Elfrida was "written on an artificial model, and in a gorgeous diction. because he thought Shakspeare had precluded all hope of excellence in any other form of drama."

"Mr. Mason, in his Elfrida, has wantonly misrepresented historical fact,—for which no man should be forgiven, and for which no beauties in his poetry can compensate."—Headley's Select Beauties of Ancient Eng. Poetry, 1810, i. lvii., n.

Massey, Gerald, b. May, 1828, near Tring, in Herts, England, the son of a canal-boatman, passed his early days as a labourer in a silk-mill, and came to London, when in his fifteenth year, as an errand-boy. After contributing a number of poetical compositions to a prominent newspaper, he mustered sufficient courage to publish a collection of his pieces in a shilling volume, (in his native town,) entitled Poems and Chansons. Of this book about 250 copies were disposed of to the good people of Tring and other "patrons of genius." Since that important era in Mr. Massey's literary life, he has given to the world three more volumes,—viz.: 1. The Ballad of Babe Christabel, with other Lyric Poems, Lon., 18mo, Feb. 1854; 3d ed., June, 1854; 4th ed., Nov. 1854; 5th ed., Feb. 1855.

"We have read these lyrics of love and these lays of freedom with the deepest interest. We would introduce the author to our readers as a young poet, and as something more. As an artist, he is not to be despised. The faculty divine is there. In him we have a genuine songster,—a man whose ear, though not yet tuned to the complete and glorious harmonies of our English tongue, is sensitive to rhythm; whose pulse and brain throb musically; whose imagination throws out images in sonorous words, each full and fitting to the other perfectly, so that sound and image seem identical. But the artistic form is only part of what we find to ponder on, to study and admire, in these lyrics. They contain a life. . . . He is a true poet; but he has grievous defects. It would be very strange if he had not. He lacks culture. He requires taste. His ear is defective. He mistakes the meaning of words, and occasionally he uses epithets which are quite absurd. His images are sometimes worse for wear. Indeed, his catalogue of faults is large and various: the marvel is that it is not much larger, much more various, than it is. Yet, with all, he has the true faculty of creative life."—Lon. Athen., Feb. 4, 1854, 139, q. v.

"Mr. Gerald Massey's lyrics have already gone through several editions, and some of them deserve their popularity. The most fastidious tastes will be the most charmed with such verses as those called 'That merry, merry May,' and the following stanzas, entitled 'Unbeloved.' . . . There is a real glow about all that Mr. Massey writes, though this glow, especially in the love-poems, is often somewhat hectic. The political and patriotic pieces in this volume are of little value, as, indeed, their author in his preface allows. His excuse for retaining them, now that he knows better, appears to us unsatisfactory. . . . We would recommend Mr. Massey, in printing a future edition, to omit most of these poems, and to tone down some of the amatory pieces."—New Poets: Edin. Rev., Oct. 1856; Notice of 5th ed., 1855.

"In 'The Ballad of Babe Christabel,' Massey appears to have concentrated all his powers; but it is neither so original, nor so worthy of his genius, as many of the shorter pieces in his book. It is marked by all that wild luxuriance, that lavish scattering of poetic beauty, distinguishing Alexander Smith's 'Life Drama.' But we never doubt the originality of Smith; whilst Massey, by saturating his mind with the full deep floods of Tennyson's genius, and by adopting the remarkable metre of 'In Memoriam,' startles us frequently by passages forcing us to pause and ask ourselves, 'Is this Massey or Tennyson?' "—Irish Quar. Rev., March, 1855, 66, q. v.

2. War Waits, 1855, fp. 8vo; 2d ed. same year. This is a volume of poems.

"Since we had the pleasure—now a year ago—to introduce this young and interesting singer to the notice of our readers, he has blossomed into finer flower; and his present offering, 'War Waits,' though written on fugitive themes and described by himself as 'rough and ready rhymes,' exhibits a poetic growth as remarkable as any we remember in so short a time."—Lon. Athen., Feb. 3, 1855, 138.

3. Craigcrook Castle, 1856, 12mo. This is a volume of poems.

"Perhaps no poet of the present day has a more exuberant fancy than Mr. Massey; but he rarely shows any higher power than fancy. The majority of his poems are like children's May-garlands,—bright with flowers which have no root and are only artificially woven into close contact. . . . We are perpetually wearied with a series of lines each of which is a fresh tax on our ingenuity in detecting fantastic analogy. . . . His versification, often highly musical through a felicity of genius, is often utterly bad through an indifference apparently due either to an excessive self-estimate or to a want of artistic scrupulousness."—Westminster Review, Jan. 1857, q. v.

Massey's Poems and Ballads were pub. by J. C. Derby, New York, 1854, 12mo; and in 1857, Messrs. Ticknor and Fields, of Boston, pub. The Complete Poetical Works of Gerald Massey, including Craigcrook Castle and all his minor poems, prefaced by a Biographical Sketch of the Author. The poetry of this young author has attracted great attention, and it would be easy to multiply commendations of his genius. We have them before us from Walter Savage Landor, Alexander Smith, George Gilfillan, London Quarterly Review, Blackwood's Magazine, Dublin University Magazine, Edinburgh News, London Examiner, London Times, London Critic, Men of the Time, and North American Review.

"Robert Burns," remarks Alexander Smith, in a lecture on the Poorer Poets of England,—the list would have been too large had it been the Poor Poets of England,—"taught Scotchmen that poverty and hard work are unable to stifle genius: Massey has taught the same lesson to Englishmen. The future career of one who has drawn beauty from poverty and strength from privation is one on which all men must look with interest, and some, perhaps, with a little anxiety. That it will be a brilliant one we have little doubt. He is yet young, and may reasonably expect a long life. His power is in lyric poetry: of this he seems to be aware; and he is not, therefore, likely to waste his best years in walks of art foreign to his nature and genius. . . . We hope that when he dies he will leave many songs behind him in the hearts of the people of England,—songs which will assist them in the work of the day, and help to make the night beautiful."

The reader must not fail to peruse our author's autobiographical reminiscences prefixed to the 5th ed. of The Ballad of Babe Christabel and other Lyrical Poems. In 1855, Mr. Massey removed to Edinburgh, where he has since resided. He still sends an occasional paper to the periodicals; and his review of Balder, in the Eclectic, has attracted the notice of at least one critic. He has within the last few months (we write in October, 1857) issued a prospectus to the secretaries and presidents of Art Societies and Literary Institutes, announcing his readiness to deliver lectures upon the following subjects:

1. Pre-Raphaelitism in Poetry and Painting. 2. The Poetry of Alfred Tennyson. 3. The Principle and Practice of Association. 4. Robert Burns and Love-Poetry. 5. Massinger, Philip, 1584–1640, a native of Salisbury, son of Arthur Massinger, a retainer of the Earl of Pembroke, was entered at St. Alban's Hall, Oxford, in his 18th year; left college without taking a degree; settled himself in London, and became a dramatic author for the rest of his days. After the death of Beaumont, he assisted Fletcher in the composition of many of his plays, (see p. 148 of this Dictionary,) and was also an associate with Thomas Decker, Thomas Middleton, William Rowley, and others, in dramatic compositions. Several of the pieces which bear his own name only were the fruits of this literary copartnership, so frequent in the days of Elizabeth. The majority of Massinger's productions have been irrecoverably lost, having been used as fuel by that unlucky servant of Warburton's (Somerset Herald) who used so many MS. dramatic productions of the past ages to feed the flames of his kitchen-fire. See FORD, JOHN, Nos. 10, 11, 12, 13.

"The English Drama," says Dr. Drake, "never suffered a greater loss (for all Shakspeare's pieces have descended to us) than in the havoc which time and negligence have committed among the works of Massinger; for of thirty-eight plays attributed to his pen only eighteen have been preserved!"—Shakspeare and his Times, ii. 561.

We give the titles of the eighteen plays thus referred to, with the dates of the first editions. 1. The Virgin Martyr; a Tragedie, 1622. By Philip Massinger and Thomas Decker. 2. The Duke of Millaine; a Tragedie, 1623. 3. The Bondman; an Antient Storie, 1624. 4. The Roman Actor; a Tragedie, 1629. 5. The Renegado; a Tragi-Comedie, 1630. 6. The Picture; a Tragi-Comedie, 1630. 7. The Emperour of the East; a Tragi-Comedie, 1632. 8. The Fatal Dowry; a Tragedy, 1632. By Massinger and Nathaniel Field. 9. The Maid of Honour; a Tragi-Comedy, 1632. 10. A New Way to Pay Old Debts, 1633. 11. The Great Duke of Florence; a Comedy, 1630. 12. The Unnatural Combat; a Tragedie, 1639. 13. A Very Woman, or The Prince of Talent; a Tragi-Comedy, 1655. 14. The Bashful Lover, 1655. 15. The Guardian; a Comedy, 1655. 16. The Old Law, or A New Way to Please You; a Comedy, 1656. Assisted by T. Middleton and T. Rowley. 17. The City Madam; a Comedy, 1659. 18. The Parliament of Love, 1805. Unfinished.

A list of fourteen other plays ascribed to Massinger will be found in Biog. Dramat. An ed. of his works was pub. by Thomas Coxeter, 1759, 4 vols. 8vo; again, with essay by G. Colman, 1761, 4 vols. 8vo; and another by John Monck Mason, 1779, '94, 4 vols. 8vo. But it was not until 1805, when William Gifford pub. his edit. in 4 vols. 8vo, that the works of this author were fairly placed before the world. A new edit., also in 4 vols. 8vo, was put to press in 1815. There has since been an edit. of Massinger's Works, 1840, r. 8vo, with the Works of John Ford, and an Introduction to both by Hartley Coleridge, 1848, r. 8vo, (pub. by Moxon;) and Mr. Murray pub., in 1830–31, The Works of Massinger as the first three vols. of his Dramatic Family Library,—in which series the plays are "adapted to family reading by the omission of exceptionable passages." See BEAUMONT, FRANCIS; COLLIER, JEREMY; FORD, JOHN; LAMB, CHARLES, pp. 149, 409, 613, 1049 of this Dictionary. Gifford's ed. of Massinger's Plays, with Notes Critical and Explanatory, (2d ed., 1813, 4 vols. 8vo,) contains, in addition to the eighteen plays just enumerated—I. Advertisement to the Second Edition; II. Introduction, with Life; III. Essay on the Dramatic Writings of Massinger; IV. List of Massinger's Plays; V. Glossarial Index. This edit. has been highly lauded:

"For these few particulars I am indebted to Mr. Gifford. I am not aware that subsequent inquiry has added any thing material to the facts which he has gathered with such commendable industry and illustrated with so much critical acumen, nor that he has been convicted of any important error."—HARTLEY COLERIDGE: Introduc. to Massinger and Ford, 1848, xviii., xix.

"The public are much better acquainted with the writings of Massinger than with those of most of his contemporaries; for which distinction he is mainly indebted to the admirable manner in which he has been edited by Mr. Gifford, and to the circumstance of some of his Plays having been illustrated on the Stage by the talents of a popular actor."—Neele's Lects. on English Poetry, Lect. IV. 130.

"Heyne never edited an ancient classic with more acumen than Mr. Gifford has edited Massinger."—Goodhugh's E. G. Lib. Man., 1827, 232.

"This is the best edition of an English dramatist that we have ever seen: the editor has done every thing which was necessary, and nothing more."—Annual Review.

"We have been reading with great delight the Massinger of our friend Gifford. If he had only discovered the secret of a style that will never grow old, he would have deserved every praise of editorship."—SIR JAMES MACKINTOSH: Life, ii. chap. viii.

"From almost every page in Mr. Gifford's edition, it appears that his constant aim has not been simply to rectify what was inaccurate, to cast aside what was superfluous, and to add what might be necessary or useful for the information of the reader, but to build his own reputation on the ruin of that of his predecessors."—Edin. Rev., xii 99–119, q. v.

See also Thomas Moore's Memoirs, &c., 1853, ii. 248; our Life of BEN JONSON in this Dictionary, p. 997.

We proceed to quote some opinions upon a number of the plays of the author under consideration:

THE VIRGIN MARTYR:

"Read the first four acts of Massinger's 'Virgin Martyr,' and Gifford's very agreeably-written 'Introduction.' The merits of the poet are certainly great, though, as usual, rather exaggerated by the editor. The style is most elegant, and, as has often been observed, modern to a miracle. There is great moral grandeur in the conception of the principal character, but no probability, no decorum, a grossness so rank as to be perfectly disgusting."—SIR JAMES MACKINTOSH: Life, i. chap. vii.

"This play has some beauties of so very high an order that, with all my respect for Massinger, I do not think he had poetical enthusiasm capable of rising up to them. His associate Decker, who wrote Old Fortunatus, had poetry enough for any thing. The very impurities which intrude themselves among the sweet pieties of this play, like Satan among the Sons of Heaven, have a strength of contrast, a raciness, and a glow in them, which are beyond Massinger. They are to the religion of the rest what Caliban is to Miranda."—CHARLES LAMB: Characters of Dramatic Writers: Works, vol. ii.

"The 'Virgin Martyr' is nothing but a tissue of instantaneous conversions to and from Paganism and Christianity. The only scenes of any real beauty and tenderness in this play are those between Dorothea and Angelo, her supposed friendless beggar-boy, but her guardian-angel in disguise, which are supposed to be by Decker."—Hazlitt's Lects. on the Dramat. Lit. of the Age of Elizabeth. Lect. IV.

"In the Virgin Martyr he has followed the Spanish model of religious autos with many graces of language and a beautiful display of Christian heroism in Dorothea; but the tragedy is in many respects unpleasing."—Hallam's Lit. Hist. of Europe, 4th ed. 1854, iii. 119.

THE UNNATURAL COMBAT:

"We read with the strongest feelings of admiration, horror, and disgust, Massinger's Tragedy of the 'Unnatural Combat.' It is surprising that a poet of so much taste and judgment in his style should have none in his story, characters, or manners. But it was with Massinger's taste as with Shakspeare's genius, which is displayed with such prodigal magnificence in the parts but never employed in the construction of the whole. No Englishman, after this play, ought ever to speak of the horrors of the German stage. . . . The union of the grandest moral purity with the rankness of the stews and with more than Germanic horrors (as in the 'Unnatural Combat') is a most extraordinary phenomenon."—SIR JAMES MACKINTOSH: Life. ii. chap. vii., viii.

"In the Unnatural Combat—probably among the earliest of Massinger's works—we find a greater energy, a bolder strain of figurative poetry, more command of terror, and perhaps of pity, than in any other of his dramas. But the dark shadows of crime and misery which overspread this tragedy belong to rather an earlier period of the English stage than that of Massinger, and were not congenial to his temper."—Hallam's Lit. Hist. of Europe, iii. 119.

"The battle between the Father and the Son, in the 'Unnatural Combat,' and the dreadful parley which precedes it, are as powerfully expressed as they are imagined. Indeed, the genius of Massinger is, perhaps, more conspicuous in this Play, with all its faults, than in any other."—Neele's Lects. on Eng. Poetry, Lect. IV., 132.

THE DUKE OF MILAN; THE FATAL DOWRY:

"Among the tragedies of Massinger I should incline to prefer the Duke of Milan. The plot borrows enough from history to give it dignity, and to counterbalance in some measure the predominance of the passion of love which the invented parts of the drama exhibit. The characters of Sforza, Marcelia, and FRANCESCO are in Massinger's best manner: the story is skilfully and not improbably developed; the pathos is deeper than we generally find in his writings; the eloquence of language, especially in the celebrated speech of Sforza before the Emperor, has never been surpassed by him. Many, however, place the Fatal Dowry still higher. This tragedy furnished Rowe with the story of his Fair Penitent. The superiority of the original, except in suitableness for representation, has long been acknowledged."—Hallam's Lit. Hist. of Europe, 4th ed., 1854, iii. 118.

"The most poetical of Massinger's productions."—Hazlitt's Lects. on the Dramat. Lit. of the Age of Elizabeth. Lect. IV., q. v.

THE PICTURE; THE BONDMAN; A VERY WOMAN; A NEW WAY TO PAY OLD DEBTS; THE CITY MADAM:

"The interest of The Bondman turns upon two different acts of penance and self-denial in the persons of the hero and heroine, Pisander and Cleora."—Hazlitt's Lects., &c.

"The Picture, The Bondman, and A Very Woman may be reckoned among the best of the tragi-comedies of Massinger. But the general merits as well as defects of this writer are perceptible in all; and the difference between these and the rest is not such as to be apparent to every reader. Two others are distinguished as more English than the rest: the scene lies at home and in the age; and to these the common voice has assigned a superiority. They are A New Way to Pay Old Debts, and The City Madam. A character drawn, as it appears, from reality, and, though darkly wicked, not beyond the province of the higher comedy. Sir Giles Overreach, gives the former drama a striking originality and an impressive vigour. It retains, alone among the productions of Massinger, a place on the stage. Gifford inclines to prefer The City Madam; which, no doubt, by the masterly delineation of Luke, a villain of a different order from Overreach, and a larger portion of comic humour and satire than is usual with this writer, may dispute the palm. But there seems to be more violent improbability in the conduct of the plot than in A New Way to Pay Old Debts. . . . This last villain, indeed, [Luke,] and that original, masterly, inimitable conception, Sir Giles Overreach, are sufficient to establish the rank of Massinger in the great province of dra matic art, [conception of character.]"—Hallam's Lit. Hist. of Europe, iii. 116, 119.

"Sir Giles Overreach is the most successful and striking effort of Massinger's pen, and the best-known to the reader; but it will hardly be thought to form an exception to the tenor of the above remarks."—Hazlitt's Lects., &c., q. v.

THE OLD LAW:

"There is an exquisiteness of moral sensibility, making one's eyes to gush out tears of delight, and a poetical strangeness, in the circumstances of this sweet tragi-comedy, which are unlike any thing in the dramas which Massinger wrote alone. The pathos is of a subtler edge. Middleton and Rowley, who assisted in it, had both of them finer geniuses than their associate."—Lamb's Characters of Dramat. Writers.

We conclude with some opinions on the general characteristics of Massinger's genius:

"Massinger is distinguished for the harmony and dignity of his dramatic eloquence. Many of his plots, it is true, are liable to heavy exceptions. . . . In a general view, nevertheless, Massinger has more art and judgment in the serious drama than any of the other successors of Shakspeare. His incidents are less entangled than those of Fletcher, and the scene of his action is more clearly thrown open for the free evolution of character. Fletcher strikes the imagination with more vivacity but more irregularity, and, amidst embarrassing positions of his own choosing Massinger puts forth his strength more collectively. . . . If the vehement passions were not Massinger's happiest element, he expresses fixed principle with an air of authority. To make us feel the elevation of human pride was the master-key which he knew how to touch in human sympathy; and his skill in it must have been derived from deep experience in his own bosom."—Campbell's Specimens of English Poetry. See also Blackw. Mag., v. 223.

"Massinger excelled in working up a single passion forcibly and effectively, rather than in managing his plots skilfully or in delineating characters faithfully and naturally. His catastrophes are sometimes brought about in a very improbable and unnatural manner. . . . With all these drawbacks, the genius of Massinger is unquestionably great. The sweetness and purity of his style were not surpassed even in his own days. His choice and management of imagery are generally very happy; excepting that he is apt to pursue a favourite idea too long. . . . I cannot quite agree with Mr. Gifford when he ranks this author immediately after Shakspeare."—Neele's Lects. on English Poetry, Lect. IV. 131, 132.

"Massinger as a tragic writer appears to me second only to Shakspeare; in the higher comedy I can hardly think him inferior to Jonson. In wit and sprightly dialogue, as well as in knowledge of theatrical effect, he falls very much below Fletcher. These, however, are the great names of the English stage. . . . Next to the grace and dignity of sentiment in Massinger, we must praise those qualities in his style. Every modern critic has been struck by the peculiar beauty of his language. In his harmonious swell of numbers, in his pure and genuine idiom, which a text—by good fortune and the diligence of its last editor [Gifford]—far less corrupt than that of Fletcher enables us to enjoy, we find an unceasing charm. The poetical talents of Massinger were very considerable. his taste superior to that of his contemporaries; the colouring of his imagery is rarely overcharged; a certain redundancy, as some may account it, gives fulness, or what the painters call impasto, to his style, and, if it might not always conduce to effect on the stage, is, on the whole, suitable to the character of his composition. The comic powers of this writer are not on a level with the serious; with some degree of humorous conception, he is too apt to aim at exciting ridicule by caricature; and his dialogue wants altogether the sparkling wit of Shakspeare and Fletcher."—Hallam's Lit. Hist. of Europe, iii. 117–118, 119–120. See also 115, 116, 511.

"There can be no doubt that Massinger admired and studied Shakspeare. In the haste of composition his mind turned up many thoughts and phrases of the elder writer, in a more or less perfect state of preservation; but he was neither a plagiarist nor an imitator. His style, conduct, characterisation, and metre are perfectly distinct. No serious dramatist of the age owed Shakspeare so little. . . . Neither Tragedy nor Comedy, in the strictest force of the terms, was his province. Besides, he had an unlucky habit of getting into a passion with his bad characters and making them wilful demonstrators of their own depravity. Smollett, particularly in his Count Fathom, falls into this mistake. Euripides was not free from it. It nowhere occurs in Homer, Cervantes, or Shakspeare, the great and true dramatists, and very seldom in Fielding or Sir Walter Scott. Massinger's excellence—a great and beautiful excellence it is—was in the expression of virtue, in its probation, its strife, its victory. He could not, like Shakspeare, invest the perverted will with the terrors of a magnificent intellect, or bestow the cestus of poetry on simple, unconscious loveliness. His dedications are beautiful samples of pure mother English, commendable for a self-respectfulness very different from the presumptuous adulation of Dryden and Young, but painful from their weary iteration of complaint and acknowledgment. . . . Complaint seems to have become habitual to him, like the sickly tone of a confirmed valetudinarian, who thinks you unfeeling if you tell him he is looking well."—HARTLEY COLERIDGE: Introduc. to Massinger and Ford, 1848, xxix., xlii., xliv.

"His dedications," says Mr. Gifford, "are principally characterized by gratitude and humility, without a single trait of that gross and servile adulation which distinguishes and disgraces the addresses of his contemporaries. That he did not conceal his misery his editors appear inclined to reckon among his faults: he bore it, however, without impatience, and we only hear of it when it is relieved."

Perhaps Hartley Coleridge had forgotten these lines when he penned his strictures on Massinger's dedications.

"On a level with, if not one degree above, the writings of Fletcher, follow the purer and more chastened productions of Philip Massinger, a poet of unwearied vigour and consummate elegance. . . . He exhibits, in the first place, a perfectibility both in diction and versification of which we have, in dramatic poetry at least, no corresponding example. There is a transparency and perspicuity in the texture of his composition, a sweetness, harmony, and ductility, together with a blended strength and ease, in the structure of his metre, which, in his best performances, delight and never satiate the ear."—Drake's Shakspeare and his Times, ii 561–562, q. v. See also vol. i. 75, 180, 310.

"Ford," says Dr. Drake, "possesses nothing of the energy and majesty of Massinger," (supra, ii. 563;) Gifford, too, remarks that Ford has not "the majestic march which distinguishes the poetry of Massinger," (Pref. to Massinger's Plays;) Lord Jeffrey, also, declares that Ford "has not much of the oratorical stateliness and imposing flow of Massinger," (Contrib. to Edin. Rev., 1853, 384;) but Coleridge (S. T.) has this strange criticism, which it is difficult to reconcile with the three eminent authorities just quoted:

"The styles of Massinger's plays and the Samson Agonistes are the two extremes of the arc within which the diction of dramatic poetry may oscillate. Shakspeare in his great plays is the midpoint. In the Samson Agonistes, colloquial language is left at the greatest distance, yet something of it is preserved, to render the dialogue probable; in Massinger the style is differenced, but differenced in the smallest degree possible, from animated conversation, by the vein of poetry."—Table-Talk, ii. 121.

"It must be confessed," says Dr. Ferriar, in his Essay on the Writings of Massinger, "that in comedy he falls considerably beneath Shakspeare: his wit is less brilliant, and his ridicule less delicate and various; but he affords a specimen of elegant comedy (The Great Duke of Florence) of which there is no archetype in his great predecessor. In tragedy Massinger is rather eloquent than pathetic; yet he is often as majestic, and generally more elegant, than his master: he is as powerful a ruler of the understanding as Shakspeare is of the passions; with the disadvantage of succeeding that matchless poet, there is still more original beauty in his work: and the most extensive acquaintance with poetry will hardly diminish the pleasure of a reader and admirer of Massinger."

See also Athen. Oxon.; Whipple's Essays and Reviews, 1851, i. 66–70; Recreations of Christopher North; Lord Jeffrey's Contrib. to Edin. Rev., 1853, 382; Lord Macaulay's Crit. and Histor. Essays, 1854, i. 58, 491, iii. 6.

The critics next to be quoted are not such ardent admirers of Massinger as some of the authorities already cited profess to be:

"The fame of Massinger has been lately revived by an edition of his works, [Gifford's.] Some literary men wish to rank him above Beaumont and Fletcher, as if he had approached more closely to the excellence of Shakspeare. I cannot see it. He appears to me to bear the greatest resemblance to Beaumont and Fletcher in the plan of the pieces, in the tone of manners, and even in the language and negligence of versification. I would not undertake to decide, from internal symptoms, whether a play belonged to Massinger or Beaumont and Fletcher."—Schlegel's Lects. on Dramat. Art. and Lit., Lect. XXVII., Black's trans., 1846, 474.

"Massinger makes an impression of hardness and repulsiveness of manner. In the intellectual processes which he delights to describe, 'reason panders will:' he fixes arbitrarily on some object which there is no motive to pursue, or every motive combined against it, and then, by screwing up his heroes or heroines to the deliberate and blind accomplishment of this, thinks to arrive at 'the true pathos and sublime of human life.' This is not the way. He seldom touches the heart or kindles the fancy. It is in vain to hope to excite much sympathy with convulsive efforts of the will or intricate contrivances of the understanding to obtain that which is better left alone, and where the interest arises principally from the conflict between the absurdity of the passion and the obstinacy with which it is persisted in. For the most part, his villains are a sort of lusus naturæ; his impassioned characters are like drunkards or madmen. Their conduct is extreme and outrageous, their motives unaccountable and weak: their misfortunes are without necessity, and their crimes without temptation, to ordinary apprehensions. I do not say that this is invariably the case in all Massinger's scenes; but I think it will be found that a principle of playing at cross-purposes is the ruling passion throughout most of them."—Hazlitt's Lects. on the Dram. Lit. of the Age of Elizabeth, Lect. IV.

Mather, Cotton, D.D., 1663–1728, son of Dr. Increase Mather, and grandson of the celebrated John Cotton, was a native of Boston, Massachusetts, graduated at Harvard College in 1678, and was ordained minister of the North Church, Boston, as colleague with his father, May 13, 1684. He was remarkable for his profound learning, unwearied industry, and zealous promotion of the public interests, both religious and secular. We commend deliberately; for we do not think it just that his unfortunate agency in the "Witchcraft Delusion" (as it is generally termed) should be permitted to counterbalance the piety and philanthropy of his otherwise exemplary and most useful life. Moreover, we have no more doubt that Cotton Mather thought he was doing God service by witch-hunting than we entertain of the purity of his motives in the pulpit-instructions and pastoral visitations for which he was so famous. Mather did not confine his efforts to oral exhortations: few men have used the pen and the press so liberally: his son (Life of Cotton Mather) gives a list of three hundred and eighty-two of his father's publications; and it is known that this list is by no means complete. Almost as much matter as has been published is still in MS., and but little of it, in all probability, will ever see the light. We hope, however, that the Biblia Americana, or The Sacred Scriptures of the Old and New Testament Illustrated, (now in the library of the Massachusetts Historical Society,) will yet find a publisher in the "Athens of America." We cannot, indeed, think of any bibliopole in that seat of learning likely to venture upon so unpromising an enterprise,—unless it be our antiquarian friend Samuel G. Drake; and the likelihood of his undertaking this trifling matter may be judged of from the following extract from his own Life of Mather, prefixed to the last ed. of the Magnalia:

"Of the 'Biblia Americana' the doctor's son remarks, 'That is a work the writing of which is enough constantly to employ a man, unless he be a miracle of diligence, the half of the threescore years and ten, the sum of years allotted to us.'"—xxxvi.

Quere: If it took so long to write it, what time would it take, and how much money would it cost, to print it? And how many copies would Boston and other Atlantic cities subscribe for? We fear that zealous theological students will still have to depend upon the MS. in their Biblical explorations. If printed, the work would be a fit companion to worthy Joseph Caryl's hydra-headed Exposition of Job, (see p. 352 of this Dictionary.)

Mather's publications were almost all single sermons, controversial letters, and tracts of a theological complexion. The best-known of his works are the following: 1. Memorable Providences relating to Witchcraft and Possessions, Lon., 1689, 8vo; 2d ed., 1691, 12mo; Edin., 1697, 12mo. 2. Some copies have a map of New England and two leaves of a list of books printed for Thomas Parkhurst. There are chasms in the paging of all. A few copies are on large paper. Col. Aspinwall's excellent American library boasts of a large-paper copy, and there is one in the library of the New York Historical Society. 1st Amer. ed., Hartford, Conn., 1820, 2 vols. 8vo. This ed., like the first, is disfigured by many errors. See Drake's Memoirs of Cotton Mather, xxxvi. 2d Amer. ed., with an Introduction and Occasional Notes by the Rev. Thomas Robbins, D.D., and Translations of the Hebrew, Greek, and Latin Quotations by Lucius F. Robinson, LL.B., 1853, 2 vols. 8vo. With a new title-page, 1855, 2 vols. 8vo. To which is added A Memoir of Cotton Mather by Samuel G. Drake, M.A. Also A Comprehensive Index by Another Hand, pp. xii., 626, 682. See The Historical Magazine, Bost., Jan. 1857, 28. To the veracity of this history we have the unimpeachable attestation of John Higginson:

"As for my self, having been, by the mercy of God, now above sixty-eight years in New-England, and served the Lord and his people in my weak measure sixty years in the ministry of the gospel, I may now say, in my old age, I have seen all that the Lord hath done for his people in New-England, and have known the beginning and progress of these churches unto this day; and, having read over much of this history, I cannot but in the love and fear of God bear witness to the truth of it; viz.: that this present church-history of New-England, compiled by Mr. Cotton Mather, for the substance, end, and scope of it, is, as far as I have been acquainted therewithall, according to truth."—Magnalia, ed. 1855, i. 15.

The worthy Higginson honestly acknowledges that he had not read the whole of the Magnalia: this was an achievement reserved for a later stage of the world's history; and the person who was entitled to claim the honour was Mr. William Tudor, the originator and first editor of the North American Review, who remarks that,

"As Chateaubriand boasts in his Itinerary that he was the last Frenchman who would ever make a pilgrimage to Jerusalem, so it may hereafter be said that the writer of this was the last (and possibly the first) individual who, bona fide, perused in regular course the whole of Mather's Magnalia; and, if any doubts had existed that great toil was necessary to the acquisition of fame, they would have been dispelled by this exertion."—N. Amer. Rev., Jan. 1818, vi. 255–272, q. v. for an excellent analysis of the Magnalia.

For ourselves, we confess that we have no right to contest Mr. Tudor's claim to be the last thorough reader of the Magnalia. Let it not be supposed, however, that Mr. Tudor considered his labour entirely thrown away:

"This book," he tells us, "is worth consulting by those who wish to become acquainted with the character of our forefathers. Many of the author's faults were those of his age; and, if he has not left us the best, he has at least furnished the largest, work appertaining to our early history. . . . To those who are interested in the early history of our country, it may be well to remark that, for accuracy in historical occurrences, they will do well to rely upon other authorities; but, if they wish to obtain a general view of the state of society and manners, they will probably nowhere find so many materials for this purpose as in the work of this credulous, pedantick, and garrulous writer."—Ubi supra, 267, 272.

Dr. Robbins has a higher opinion of Mather's historical accuracy than is expressed by Mr. Tudor:

"The work now presented to the American public contains the history of the Fathers of New England, for about eighty years, in the most authentic form. No man since Dr. Mather's time has had so good an opportunity as he enjoyed to consult the most authentic documents. The greater part of his facts could be attested by living witnesses and the shortest tradition, or taken from written testimonies, many of which have since perished. The situation and character of the author afforded him the most favourable opportunities to obtain the documents necessary for his undertaking; and no historian could pursue a similar design with greater industry and zeal. . . . The work is both a civil and an ecclesiastical history. The large portion of it devoted to Biography affords the reader a more distinct view of the leading characters of the times than could have been given in any other form."—Pref. to ed. of 1820.

"The demand for the work is now increasing. The History of New-England cannot be written without this authority. It is equally important in the department of Biography and History, Civil and Ecclesiastical."—Ibid., 1852, Pref. to ed. of 1853.

"It is chiefly a collection of what the author had before printed on historical and biographical subjects. The value of its contents has been variously estimated,—some decrying it below any value, while others pronounce it 'the only classic ever written in America.' At the hazard of incurring the charge of stupidity, it is the decided opinion of the writer that it has a value between these two extremes."—S. G. Drake: Memoir of Cotton Mather, xxxvi.

"Liber quidem superstitionis plenus, utilis tamen illis, qui nasum habent."—Meusel.

"One of the most singular books in this or in any other language. Its puns and its poems, its sermons and its anagrams, render it unique in its kind. "His works are of a kind which were attractive and interesting in their day, but now sleep in repose where even the antiquary seldom disturbs them. He will be remembered, however, as the author of the Magnalia, a work which, with all its faults, will always find interested readers; as a man, too, of unexampled industry and unrivalled attainments in curious rather than useful learning."—Wm. Anglorum. 10. Directions to a Candidate for the Ministry, 1726, 12mo. 11. The Student and Preacher; new ed., with addits. by John Ryland, D.D., Lon., 1781, sm. 8vo.

"The book is little known in proportion to its worth and excellence."—Lowndes's Brit. Lib., 820.

"Many useful hints on books, in a quaint style."—Bickersteth's C. S., 4th ed., 487.

In this work Mather expresses a very favourable opinion of Morning Exercises at Cripplegate, (5th ed., edited by James Nichols, with Index by Rev. Dr. T. H. Horne, 1844–45, 6 vols. 8vo, £3 12s.)

"In fine, the six volumes of the Morning Exercises will give you such a variety both of matter and of talents that I could wish you not to be without them."—Mather's Preacher.

We have expressed a highly-favourable character of Cotton Mather; and it would not be difficult to quote commendations quite as warm from both ancient and modern authorities. The New England Weekly Journal, in announcing his decease a few days after the occurrence, remarks that "He was, perhaps, the principal Ornament of this Country, the greatest Scholar that ever was bred in it. But, besides his universal Learning, his excellent Piety and extensive Charity, his entertaining Wit and singular goodness of Temper recommended him to all that were Judges of real and distinguished merit."

"His printed writings, so full of piety and various erudition, his vast correspondence, and the continual reports of travellers who had conversed with him, had spread his reputation into other countries. And when, about fourteen years ago, I travelled abroad, I could not but admire to what extent his fame had reached, and how inquisitive were gentlemen of letters to hear and know of the most particular and lively manner, both of his private conversation and public performances among us."—Rev. Thomas Prince.

"His printed works will not convey to posterity nor give to strangers a just idea of the real worth and great learning of the man."—Dr. Colman: Funeral Serm. on Cotton Mather.

As regards Mather's learning, Dr. Chauncey, a contemporary, declared that there were "hardly any books in existence with which Cotton Mather was not acquainted," and that he was "the greatest redeemer of time he ever knew."

The last remark will remind the reader of the inscription which Mather placed over his library-door: "Be Short." We wish that we had courage enough to place it over ours. For other notices of the life and works of this excellent man, see the Life of Cotton Mather, by his son Samuel Mather, Bost., 1729, 8vo; Life of Cotton Mather in the N. England Histor. and Genealog. Biog., First Series, vi. 161–350, has been warmly commended by an eminent authority:

"Mr. Peabody has clearly used the utmost industry in bringing together all existing information pertaining to his subject. He has woven from these scattered materials an exceedingly graceful and lively narration."—J. G. Palfrey: N. Amer. Rev., xliii. 519.

Perhaps we need hardly add that Dr. Douglas, and some other judges, by no means concur in the favourable verdicts already cited respecting the character of Cotton Mather; and among the dissentients may be mentioned our learned and esteemed friend Mr. Bancroft, who in his History of the United States (iii. 97–99) handles the author of Memorable Providences relating to Witchcraft in a "memorable" manner. See also Quincy's Hist. of Harvard University, i. 346.

Mather, Eleazar, 1637–1669, first minister of Northampton, Mass., the son of Richard Mather. A Serious Exhortation to the Succeeding and Present Generation: being the substance of several Serms., 1671. Posth. See Mather's Magnalia, b. iii. 130.

Mather, Increase, D.D., 1639–1723, a native of Dorchester, Mass., the son of Richard Mather, graduated at Harvard College in 1656, began to preach in 1657, and in the North Church, Boston, in 1661, and was ordained there May 27, 1664; President of Harvard College, 1685–1701. He was a man of learning, piety, and indefatigable industry. Few men have been so long in the ministry,—sixty-six years, sixty-two of which were passed in one place. His son Cotton (in his Parentator: Memoirs of Remarkable Places in the Life and the Death of the Ever-Memorable Dr. Increase Mather, Bost., 1724, 8vo) gives us a list of eighty-five of his father's publications, (principally sermons,) to which are to be added seven more works, and many prefaces to other people's books. Among his works are—1. The Mystery of Israel's Salvation Explained and Applied, Lon., 1669, 8vo.

"This is full of learning, and contains frequent references to other authors confirming Mather's views."—Lowndes's Brit. Lib., 971.

Providences, &c., Bost., 1684; new ed., under the title of Remarkable Providences Illustrative of the Earlier Days of American Colonization; with Introduc. Pref. by George Offor, Lon., 1856, 12mo. (In J. Russell Smith's Library of Old Authors.) In this book we have a singular collection of remarkable sea-deliverances, accidents, unaccountable phenomena, witchcraft, apparitions, &c.

"Increase Mather's work is well worth preserving, and its present publication is timely. It is pleasant to see that the performances which are now attributed to spirits' rappings, tippings, trances, second-sight, and the like, were well known to the grave fathers of New England, and that Dr. Gordon's theory of the devil at work in these occurrences was defended so ably by a President of Harvard College. We regard this book as a capital contribution to spiritualistic literature, in its collection of 'test cases,' its accurate collection of marvels, and its delightful credulity."—N. Amer. Rev., Oct. 1857, 554.

5. Discourse on the Maintenance due to those who Preach the Gospel, on Tithes, &c., Bost., 1706, 16mo.

"My father, John Cotton, would sometimes say, pleasantly, that there was nothing cheap in New England besides milk and ministers."—p. 32.

6. A Disquisition on Ecclesiastical Councils, 1716, 16mo. Dr. Mather remarks that he leaves this work as his dying farewell to the churches in this land, after having served them, "in a poor weak manner, for more than five above a jubilee of years," (p. 38.)

7. A Dying Pastor's Legacy. 8. Elijah's Mantle, 1722. His last production was his Agathangelus, a preface to Cotton Mather's Cœlestinus, 1723, 18mo. See Parentator as above, with a Pref. by the Rev. Mather, Ralph. Cotton Spinners, 1780, 8vo.

Mather, Richard, 1596–1669, the first of the eminent New England divines of this name, was a native of Lancashire, England; was admitted a student at Oxford, 1618; ordained, in the same year, by the Bishop of Chester, and became minister of Toxteth; was silenced for Non-Conformity in 1633, but soon restored again; superseded in 1634; emigrated to Boston, Mass., Aug. 17, 1635; became pastor of the new church in Dorchester, Aug. 23, 1636. He was the author of a number of serms., controversial treatises, &c. See Life and Death of Richard Mather, by Increase Mather, Camb., Mass., 1670, 4to; Neal's Hist. of New England; Athen. Oxon.; Magnalia, b. iii. 122–130; Mass. Hist. Coll., viii. 10.

Mather, Samuel, 1626–1671, a son of the preceding, was a native of Lancashire, England, graduated at Harvard College, 1643; returned home and preached in England, Scotland, and Ireland. He pub. a number of works, among which are—1. Old Testament Types Explained and Improved, in sundry Serms., Dubl., 1673, 4to; Lon., 1683, 4to; 1705, 4to. Rewritten by Caroline Fry, under the title of The Gospel of the Old Testament, 1833, 2 vols. 12mo; new ed., 1851, 12mo.

"There is a large portion of very useful information in this work, which is divided into six books, and these again into many chapters. Mather had a respectable acquaintance with the literature of the Bible. In Hebrew he is of the old school, and defends the Masorets and Buxtorfs with a good deal of keenness."—Orme's Bibl. Bib.

Mather, Samuel, D.D., 1706–1785, a son of Cotton Mather, D.D., graduated at Harvard College, 1723, was for about ten years a colleague with Mr. Gee in the Old North Church, Boston, and subsequently pastor of a portion of his old congregation, who built a church in Bennet Street, now occupied by the Universalists. He pub. a number of serms., theolog. tracts, and other works,—one of the rarest of which is An Attempt to show that America was known to the Ancients, Bost., 1773, 8vo.

"A work of equal learning and patriotism. . . . It maintains that the posterity of Japhet by Magog were the primary inhabitants of America,—a warlike people, well qualified to make those Ancient Encampments which have been discovered at the West."—Is Thomas.

Mathias, Thomas James, Fellow of Trinity College, Cambridge, 1776, Treasurer of the Household to Queen Charlotte, d. 1835, at Naples, where he had resided for many years, is best known as the supposed author of an anonymous poem entitled The Pursuits of Literature, Part 1, 1794; subsequently completed in four Parts, 1794–97, in 1 vol. 8vo; 4th ed., 1808, 8vo; 16th ed., 1812, imp. 4to, large paper for illustration. Messrs. Willis and Sotheran advertise an illustrated copy of the ed. of 1799, inlaid, in imp. fol., 2 vols.; upwards of 200 portraits, £10 10*s*. See W. and S.'s catalogue, Oct. 25, 1856, 412. The value of this work consists in the satirical notes, which excited great attention and no little indignation. George Steevens said that the poem was merely a peg to hang the notes on. It is known that Mrs. Rochfort claimed the authorship of The Pursuits of Literature for her brother, Dr. Burgh, of York: see Lon. Athen., 1835, 717. Mathias's edit. of the Works of Gray has been already noticed by us: see pp. 726, 729 of this Dictionary. Mathias's fame chiefly rested upon his intimate acquaintance with the Italian language, in which he pub. several books. See Lon. Gent. Mag., 1835, Pt. 2, 551; Watt's Bibl. Brit.

"The name of Mathias is well known to every lover of the Italian tongue: his poetical productions rank with those of Milton in merit, and far exceed them in quantity."—Wm. H. Prescott, the historian: Biog. and Crit. Miscell., 1855, 413: Italian Narrative Poetry.

"Talked of the 'Pursuits of Literature,' and the sensation it produced when published. "Funchal mentioned Mathias as an instance of success in this way; but Binda (I was glad to find) pronounced his verses to be very indifferent."—Ibid., iii. 274.

Perhaps Mathias's most valuable publication in Italian was his ed. of Tiraboschi's Storia della Poesia Italiana, Lon., 1805, 4 vols. 12mo. The value of Tiraboschi's works is well known to the Italian student: see Hallam's Lit. Hist. of Europe; Dibdin's Lib. Comp.; Eustace's Italy. We may add that Parnaso Italiano, ovvero Raccolta de Poetici Classici, Vinezia, 1784–1803, 56 vols. 12mo, should stand near to Tiraboschi's work on the library-shelf. The translations give a comprehensive view of the Italian tongue. Doubtless some of the authors in the series contain but little which will edify the student.

Matthew of Westminster, a monk of the Abbey of Westminster, supposed to have died 1307 to 1377, is known as the author of Flores Historiarum,—a narration extending from the creation of the world to the death of Edward I. Seventy years—carrying the history down to the death of Edward III., 1377—were afterwards added by another hand. The Flores Historiarum was pub. at London, 1567, fol.; Francofurti, (with Florence of Wor-Chester; see p. 608 of this Dictionary,) 1601, fol. This ed. is very incorrect. A trans. of the Flowers of History, (to 1307,) by C. D Yonge, was pub. in H. G. Bohn's Antiq. Library, 1853, 2 vols. fp. 8vo.

Maturin, Charles Robert, 1782–1824, a native of Dublin, educated at Trinity College in that city, was for a time Curate of St. Peter's, Dublin, and, after resigning that post, became an author by profession. His tragedies and novels exhibit considerable genius; but he often violates good morals by indecency, and good taste by exaggeration and a morbid love of the horrible. 1. Fatal Revenge, or The Family of Montorio; a Novel, 1804, 4 vols. 12mo. This novel, and also Nos. 2 and 3, bore the name of Dennis Jasper Murphy on the title-page.

"One of the wildest and strangest of all false creations proceeding from the heat-oppressed brain. It is for the most part a tissue of magnificent yet unappalling horrors."—SIR T. N. TALFOURD: New Monthly Mag., and in his Miscell. Writings.

2. The Wild Irish Boy; a Novel, 1808, 3 vols. 12mo. 3. The Milesian Chief; a Novel, 1811, 4 vols. 12mo.

"There is a bleak and misty grandeur about it, which, in spite of its glaring defects, sustains for it an abiding place in the soul. Yet never, perhaps, was there a more unequal production."—SIR T. N. TALFOURD: ubi supra.

4. Waterloo; a Prize Poem. 5. Bertram, or The Castle of St. Aldobrand; a Tragedy, 1816, 8vo. This tragedy, brought out at Drury Lane by the influence of Lord Byron, was very successful. Sir Walter Scott styled it "grand and powerful, the language most animated and poetical, and the characters sketched with a masterly enthusiasm."

"A fine piece of writing, wrought out of a nauseous tale, and rendered popular, not by its poetical beauties, but by the violence with which it jars on the sensibilities and awakens the sluggish heart from its lethargy."—SIR T. N. TALFOURD: New Monthly Mag., &c.

"Incoherent language, improbable incidents, and distracted vehemence. It is strange, and startling, and impressive: it has many faults, and they all belong to genius."—Allan Cunningham's Biog. and Crit. Hist. of the Lit. of the Last Fifty Years, 1833.

Coleridge had a very contemptuous opinion of Bertram: see his Biographia Literaria; Blackw. Mag., ii. 17, xiv. 557.

6. Manuel; a Tragedy, 1817. Unsuccessful.

"The absurd work of a clever man."—LORD BYRON.

"'Manuel,' its [Bertram's] successor, feebler, though in the same style, excited little attention, and less sympathy."—SIR T. N. TALFOURD: New Monthly Mag., &c.

7. Women, or Pour et Contre; a Novel, 1818, 3 vols. 12mo.

"We observe with pleasure that Mr. Maturin has put his genius under better regulation than in his former publications, and retrenched that luxuriance of language and too copious use of ornament which distinguishes the authors and orators of Ireland, whose exuberance of imagination sometimes places them in the predicament of their honest countryman who complained of being run away with by his legs."—SIR WALTER SCOTT: Edin. Rev., xxx. 234–257.

"Less unequal, but we think, on the whole, less interesting, than the author's earlier productions."—SIR T. N. TALFOURD: New Monthly Mag., &c.

"An Irish story, wild, wonderful, and savage, with many redeeming touches of pathos and beauty, and brought frequently back from extravagance by fine traits of character."—Allan Cunningham's Biog. and Crit. Hist., &c.

See also Lon. Month. Rev., lxxxvi. 403.

8. XXIII. Serms., 1819, 8vo. 9. Fredolpho; a Tragedy, 1819. Full of horrors, and unsuccessful. 10. Melmoth the Wanderer; a Novel, 1820, 4 vols. 12mo.

"No writer of good judgment would have attempted to revive the defunct horrors of Mrs. Radcliffe's school of Romance, or the demoniacal incarnations of Mr. Lewis. But, as if he were determined not to be arraigned for a single error only, Mr. Maturin has contrived to render his production almost as objectionable in the manner as it is in the matter."—Edin. Rev., xxxv. 353–362.

"The author is evidently mad; but it is the madness of great genius. . . . The extravagances and utter want of decorum in the book quite confound one when one considers it as the work of a clergyman."—Extracts from the Portfolio of a Man of the World: Lon. Gent. Mag., 1846, Pt. 1, 468.

"Melmoth is not altogether so mad as some reviewers pronounced it, yet sufficiently so to excuse thousands for closing their eyes against the poetic invention and buoyancy of fancy everywhere visible."—Allan Cunningham's Biog. and Crit. Hist., &c.

He pub. some medical treatises, &c. in French and English, and was the author of Journal Britannique, La Haye, 18 tomes 12mo, a French review of the productions of the English press, issued every two months.

"The author of the Journal Britannique sometimes aspires to the character of a poet and philosopher: his style is pure and elegant; and in his virtues, or even in his defects, he may be ranked as one of the last disciples of the school of Fontenelle."—GIBBON, the historian.

He was an under-librarian in the British Museum. As an author he is best known by his New Review, with Literary Curiosities and Literary Intelligence, 1782–1786, Lon., 1782–86, 9 vols. 8vo.

"Looked into the first three volumes of Maty's Review. His negligent, easy manner, for want of adequate stamina to support it, sometimes degenerates into flippancy and pertness: his critique, however, on the Poem of 'Les Jardins' by the Abbé de Lisle (Art. XVII., June, 1782) is wonderfully animated and fine."—Green's Diary of a Lover of Lit., 1810, 4to, 169. See also 162, 173.

Maundrell, Henry, chaplain to the English factory at Aleppo, gained considerable celebrity by a most interesting book of travels,—Journey from Aleppo to Jerusalem at Easter A.D. 1697, Oxf., 1703, '07, '14, '21, '32, '34, '40, '43, '49, 8vo; new ed., Lon., 1810, r. 8vo. There are copies on large paper of this edit., and several of the others. The ed. of 1721 is called by Dibdin "the crack edition;" that of 1740 is the first which has an Index.

"Whom it is a pleasure to quote as well as to read, and whose Journey from Aleppo to Jerusalem, though a little book, is yet worth a folio, and is so accurately and ingeniously written that it might serve as a model for all writers of travels."—BISHOP NEWTON.

"A plain unaffected narrative, but written with an uncouthness of style which we should not expect to find in any composition of this century."—Green's Diary of a Lover of Lit., Ipswich, 1810, 4to, 17.

"It is doubtless a most interesting book."—Dibdin's Lib. Comp., 1825, 435.

Maury, Anu, b. 1803, at Liverpool, England, whilst her father, James Maury, was the American consul in that city, is a descendant of the Rev. James Fontaine, and has republished the autobiography of her ancestor, together with an account of the author and his descendants, under the title of Memoirs of a Huguenot Family, N. York, 1854, 12mo. In the Appendix to this vol. will be found an English trans. of the Edict of Nantes.

Maury, F. Treat. on the Dental Art, 1843, 8vo.

Maury, Matthew Fontaine, LL.D., Lieut. U. S. Navy, and Superintendent of the National Observatory at Washington, was born in Spottsylvania county, Virginia, Jan. 14, 1806, and entered the navy in 1825 as a midshipman. Zealously devoting his leisure hours to intense study, he soon acquired an intimate knowledge of the branches connected with his profession, and, before receiving promotion, wrote and published (about 1835) his Treatise on Navigation, which afterwards became the text-book for the navy. A third ed. of this excellent work was recently put to press. See South. Lit. Mess., ii. 454. Lieut. Maury's Abstract Log was pub. in 1848, 4to.

In 1839, having by an accident been rendered incapable of active service, he became favourably known as a popular writer of essays upon many of the most interesting subjects of the day: such as Naval Reform, with the quaint caption of Scraps from the Lucky-Bag; National Defences; Suppression of the African Slave-Trade; Right of Search; The Gulf Stream; The Packet-Ships of New York; The Warehousing System; Southern Commerce; Overland Communication with the Pacific; The Swamp Lands of the Mississippi, and their Reclamation. Many of his plans and suggestions have been engrafted upon the policy of the country. The Legislature of Illinois entered his papers on the Lake Country in their journal, and passed him a vote of thanks.

He published a pamphlet on The Amazon and the Atlantic Slopes of South America, and induced the Government to send out expeditions to explore that river-basin. Herndon's Exploration of the Amazon, as well as that of the Rio de la Plata, were the fruits of that suggestion.

Having been placed at the head of the National Observatory at Washington as soon as it was erected, he proceeded to organize it, and succeeded so completely that with the first volume of observations the character of the American Observatory was raised at once, in the opinion of the leading astronomers of Europe, to a rank equal to that of any establishment of the kind in the world.

The Observatory being in successful operation, Lieut. Maury next turned his attention to the Hydrographical Department of his office, and produced his celebrated Wind and Current Charts, with his book of "Sailing Directions" which accompanies them.

This is the great work of the age in its bearings on commerce and navigation. The Government, appreciating the importance of it, invited the maritime nations of Europe to send delegates to meet Lieut. Maury in conference with the view of discussing the details of a plan for perfecting this work. This meeting took place at Brussels, in August, 1853, and resulted in the adoption of a uniform plan of observations at sea, and in having the co-operation of the principal maritime nations in carrying it out.

"I beg you," says Baron Humboldt, "to express to Lieut. Maury, the author of the beautiful charts of the winds and currents, prepared with so much care and profound learning, my hearty gratitude and esteem. It is a great undertaking, equally important to the practical navigator and for the advance of meteorology in general."

See Lon. Athenæum, 1853, 529, 891, 968, 1154; 1854, 1327; Lord Wrottesley's Speech in the House of Lords, April 26, 1853; South. Lit. Mess., vii. 560, x. 393; Amer. Jour. of Science, xlvii. 161; Hunt's Mag., xviii. 516. In 1855, New York, cr. 8vo, appeared Maury's principal work, The Physical Geography of the Sea, 6th ed., with Important Addits., [including Lieut. Jansen's Zone Experiments, which cast unexpected light upon atmospheric circulation,] 1856, r. 8vo.

"Matter of more general or higher scientific importance than that contained in these Addenda is seldom gathered from any fields of research."—From Maury's Pref. to 6th ed.

"We err greatly if Lieut. Maury's book will not hereafter be classed with the works of the great men who have taken the lead in extending and improving knowledge and art: his book displays in a remarkable degree, like the 'advancement of learning,' and the natural history of Buffon, profound research and magnificent imagination."—Illustrated London News.

"We have not met for a long period with a book which is at once so minute and profound in research, and so plain, manly, and eloquent in expression. . . . At almost every page there are proofs that Lieut. Maury is as pious as he is learned. . . . This is but one passage of a book which will make a sensation not like that or equal to that made by Uncle Tom's Cabin, but a durable and expanding impression in the general mind; and hereafter Lieut. Maury will be remembered amongst the great scientific men of the age and the benefactors of mankind."—Lon. Economist.

"The Geography of the Seas, which has recently assumed so imposing a shape under the hands of the accomplished and enterprising Maury."—Hon. R. C. Winthrop: Oration on the Occasion of the Inauguration of the Franklin Statue at Boston, Sept. 17, 1856.

"Acquiescing fully, then, in the name and distinction of 'Physical Geography of the Sea,' we may add that we consider Lieut. Maury a worthy interpreter of the great phenomena included under this title. Attached, as Superintendent, to the National Observatory at Washington, he has used this honourable position, with much zeal and high intelligence, in forwarding objects of singular importance to his own country and to ours, and of general interest to all nations of the world. He published some years ago his 'Wind and Current Charts,' a valuable precursor of the present volume."—Edin. Rev., April, 1857.

The important services referred to by the periodical from which we have just quoted have been cordially acknowledged by foreign countries: we have lying before us a copy of a letter to Maury (Berlin, Feb. 3, 1855) from

Baron Humboldt, accompanied by the gift from the King of Prussia of two complimentary medals; a copy of a letter (Washington, Nov. 14, 1856) from the Chargé d'Affaires of Denmark, proffering, on the part of his sovereign, the Cross of a Knight of the Order of the Dannebrog; and a notification of a request from the Austrian Government that Lieut. Maury would furnish his portrait to be included in the Gallery of One Hundred Distinguished Men of Science shortly to be published by an Austrian commission established for that purpose. Nor should we omit noticing in this record of well-earned honours the gold medal sent by the King of the Netherlands to Lieut. Maury, with the inscription—

Aan M. F. Maury, Den Underzooker der Natuur, Den Gide over den Ocean, en Weldonner van den Zeeman,—De Koning, M.D.CCCL.V.

[To M. F. Maury, The Student of Nature, The Leader over the Ocean, and The Benefactor of the Seaman,—The King, M.D.CCCL.V.]

"Which, to my mind," remarks one of the most eminent scholars and philosophers of the age, "is as well conceived, substantial, and proud an inscription as I know of."—Letter of Dr. Francis Lieber to the author of this Dictionary, May 20, 1856.

Since the above was written, Lieut. Maury has received from the Archduke Ferdinand of Austria a gold medal for Art and Science, awarded to him by his Imperial Apostolic Majesty, the Emperor of Austria, (May, 1858.)

Among Maury's contributions to scientific literature we must not omit to mention particularly the following papers: On The Gulf Stream and Currents of the Sea, in Amer. Jour. of Sci., xlvii. 161, and in South. Lit. Mess., x. 193; On The Commercial Advantages of the Gulf of Mexico, in De Bow's Review, vii. 510; On The Washington Observatory, in South. Lit. Mess., xiv. 4, xv. 304; On Naval Reform and a Naval School; On the Defences of the Gulf of Mexico, and of the Lakes; On the Amazon and the Atlantic Slopes of South America. These papers attracted wide-spread attention: they were translated and republished in Brazil, Peru, Bolivia, Venezuela, New Grenada, Ecuador, and the Argentine Confederation.

Maury, Sarah Mytton, d. 1848, in Virginia, was born in Liverpool, where her father, James Maury, was for nearly half a century American consul. She was a lady of rare talents and remarkable powers of conversation. 1. The Statesmen of America in 1846, Lon., 1847, p. 8vo.

"This strange book will disappoint no collector of human absurdities, be his museum ever so richly stocked. The tone of every page reminds us of nothing so much as of the Munchausen in (we think) one of poor Haynes Bayly's stories. . . . Mrs. Maury announces the opinions of 'an Englishwoman on America.' We hope she will not fail (somewhere about April-Day) in performing the promised entertainment."—Lon. Athen., Jan. 30, 1847, 118.

This industrious author, who had contributed so largely to the education of the youth of Great Britain, was able, on a review of his extensive labours, to record his satisfaction that he could contemplate

"what he had done without a fear and without a blush. The consciousness of meaning well, however imperfect his performances, and that he has never, by a single sentiment, pandered to vice or injured the cause of virtue, will shed a gleam of sunshine on the closing scenes of life."

How far more precious than all the incense which Fame can offer is such a self-approving verdict as this!

May, Caroline, daughter of the Rev. Edward Harrison May, of the Dutch Reformed Church, city of New York, has contributed prose and poetical pieces to periodicals, and given to the world two volumes of selections from the writings of authors, viz.:—1. The American Female Poets, with Biographical and Critical Notices, Phila., 1848, 8vo; 1854, 8vo.

"These notices are written with much ability, and, together with the selections, they show a sound judgment, a highly-cultivated literary taste, and great freedom and command of language."—Prof. Hart's Female Prose-Writers of America, ed. 1855, 441.

"Her biographical notices are excellent, and her critical estimates just and appropriate: they are marked by a loving appreciation of merit, and grateful expression, that shew her fitness for the pleasing task she has undertaken."—MRS. E. F. ELLETT: N Amer. Rev., lxviii. 435: The Female Poets of America.

"The little biographical notices adverted to are written in the ambitious style of which we have recently been favoured with more than one transatlantic example."—Lon. Athenæum, 1848, 1144.

2. Treasured Thoughts from Favourite Authors, 1850, 8vo.

"This work is worthy its name: its perusal will convince the reader of the judgment and discrimination of the compiler."—Mrs. Hale's Woman's Record, 1853, 833.

"In both of these works she displays admirable judgment and pure taste. In her own poetical productions—which the lovers of poetry have reason to regret have never been collected into a volume—she exhibits the higher elements of the poetical character,—true feeling and imagination."—T. B. Read's Female Poets of America, 6th ed., 1855, 463, q. v. for two of Miss May's poems.

Others will be found in Griswold's Female Poets of America, 2d ed., 1853, 345–348. Dr. Griswold remarks that Miss May "is the author of many very graceful and striking poems," and Prof. Hart styles her one of the sweetest of our female poets, (supra.) 3. The Woodbine; a Holiday Gift, 1852, 18mo.

May, Thomas, 1594?–1650, son of Sir Thomas May, was educated at Sidney College, Cambridge; came to London and was admitted a member of Gray's Inn; became a favourite with Charles I. and his queen, (by whose command he pub. several of his poetical works,) but on the breaking out of the Civil War sided with the Parliament and was appointed its Secretary or Historiographer. He pub. four political tracts, was concerned in the translation of Barclay's Argenis and his Icon Animarum, (see BARCLAY, JOHN,) and also gave to the world the following works: 1. The Georgics of Virgil, trans. into English, with Annotations, Lon., 1622, '28, 16mo. Lucan's Pharsalia, trans. into English, 1627. With a Continuation, 1630. The Whoole Ten Bookes, 1635, 8vo. The Continuation was trans. into Latin by May, and pub., with the title of Supplementum Lucani Libri VIII., Lugd. Bat., 1640, 8vo.

"His parts of nature and art were very good, as appears by his translation of Lucan, (none of the easiest work of that kind,) and more by his Supplement to Lucan, which, being entirely his own for the learning, the wit, and the language, may be well looked upon as one of the best epic poems in the English language. He writ some other commendable pieces of the reign of some of our kings."—EARL OF CLARENDON. See Nos. 5, 6, 9.

"He was an elegant poet, and translated Lucan into English. Now, though Scaliger was pleased to say hypocritically of Lucan, 'non canit, sed latrat;' yet others (under the rose) as judiciously allow him an excellent poet, and losing no lustre by Mr. May's translation."—Fuller's Worthies, ed. 1840, iii. 259.

"May is certainly a sonorous dactylist, and was sufficiently accomplished in poetical declamation for the continuation of Lucan's Pharsalia. But May is scarcely an author in point. His skill is in parody; and he was confined to the peculiarities of an archetype which, it may be presumed, he thought excellent."—Milton's Poems, by Warton, Pref., p. xv., ed. 1784.

"The first Latin poetry which England can vaunt is May's Supplement to Lucan. in seven books, which carry down the history of Pharsalia to the death of Cæsar. This is not only a very spirited poem, but, in many places at least, an excellent imitation. —Hallam's Lit. Hist. of Europe, 4th ed., 1854, iii. 54, q. v.

"His battle-pieces highly merit being brought forward to notice: they possess the requisites in a considerable degree for interesting the feelings of an Englishman: while in accuracy they vie with a gazette, they are managed with such dexterity as to busy the mind with unceasing agitation. with scenes highly diversified and impassioned by striking character, minute incident, and alarming situation."—Headley's Select Beauties, &c., vol. i., lviii.

See the account of the battles of Cressy and Poictiers in this poem.

7. Cleopatra; a Tragedy, 1639, 8vo. 8. Agrippina, Empress of Rome; a Tragedy, 1639, '54, 12mo. 9. The History of the Parliament of England which began Nov. 3; With a Short and Necessary View of some Precedent Years; published by Authority, Lon., 1647, fol. Concludes with an account of the first battle of Newbury in 1643. With a continuation to the death of Charles I., in Latin, under the title of Historiæ Parliamenti Angliæ Breviarum, 1650, 12mo. May afterwards made an abstract of this History, and a translation, entitled A Breviary of the History of the Parliament of England, 1650, 8vo; 1680, 12mo. A new ed. of May's History of the Parliament, edited by Baron Maseres, with a Preface, &c., was pub. in 1812, 4to; and another ed. was pub. in 1853. Respecting the merits of this work—which is really rather a History of the Civil War than of the Long Parliament—there is a wide diversity of opinion. It is believed that the author, who as Secretary to the Parliament was obliged to obey its commands, accepted of this duty with great reluctance. His defection from the royalists, and this defence of their opponents,—though not a little tempered by recollections of ancient kindness from the throne, —excited the lively indignation of May's former associates. His old acquaintance, the historian of the Great Rebellion, remarks that May "fell from his duty and all his former friends, and prostituted himself to the vile office of celebrating the infamous acts of those who were in rebellion against the king; which he did so meanly that he seemed to all men to have lost his wits when he left his honesty, and shortly after died miserable and neglected, and deserves to be forgotten."—EARL OF CLARENDON: Life, vol. i.

But let us hear the other side: the Earl of Chatham declares it to be "a much honester and more instructive book of the same period of history than Lord Clarendon's."—Lord Chatham's Letters to his Nephew, ed. 1809, 59.

The noble editor of this little volume remarks that May's book

"cannot by any means be considered as an impartial work. It is, however, well worthy of being attentively read; and the contemptuous character given of it by Lord Clarendon (Life, vol. i. p. 35) is as much below its real merit as Clarendon's own history is superior to it."—LORD GRENVILLE.

"Behold the political criticism in literature! However we may be inclined to respect the feelings of Clarendon, this will not save his judgment nor his candour. We read May now as well as Clarendon; nor is the work of May that of a man who 'had lost his wits,' nor is it meanly performed."—Disraeli's Quarrels of Authors: Miscell. of Lit., ed. 1840, 260.

"There is more candour in this history than the royalists were willing to allow him; but there is less elegance than one would expect from the pen of so polite and classical a scholar."—Granger's Biog. Hist. of Eng., iv. 36.

"May's History of the Parliament is a just composition, according to the rules of history. It is written with much judgment, penetration, manliness, and spirit, and with a candour that will greatly increase your esteem when you understand that he wrote by order of his masters the parliament. It breaks off (much to the loss of the history of that time) just when their armies were new-modelled by the self-denying ordinance."—BISHOP WARBURTON: Letters to Hurd, 4th ed., 103, 108.

"May's History of the Parliament, published in 1647, is upon a more regular and classical model than any former author had adopted; and had he completed the whole with as much moderation and coolness as we find in what is published, which there is some reason to suspect would not have been the case, no historian of that century would have deserved a higher reputation."—DR JOHN ALLEN: Edin. Rev., liii. 10. (Review of Lingard's Hist. of Eng.)

"The latter [the Parliament] had, however, a writer who did them honour: May's History of the Parliament is a good model of genuine English: he is plain, terse, and vigorous, never slovenly, though with few remarkable passages, and is, in style as well as substance, a kind of contrast to Clarendon."—Hallam's Lit. Hist. of Europe, 4th ed., 1854. iii. 151.

"May's History of the Parliament is good; but it breaks off at the most interesting crisis of the struggle."—Lord Macaulay's Crit. and Histor. Essays, 1854, i. 30.

To return to less favourable verdicts:

"There is a History of the Long Parliament, by May, which is not without its value, though, from the shortness of the period which it embraces and the cold and general manner in which it is written, it will disappoint the reader, who might naturally expect much more curious matter from one who was Secretary to the House and wrote from the midst of such unprecedented scenes."—Prof. Smyth's Lects. on Mod. Hist., Lect. XVI.

"With all his apparent coolness and candour, he leans most unequivocally and decidedly to the side of the Parliament, whose proceedings he exhibits in the most plausible and imposing form, while he is ever insinuating the worst construction upon those of the Court."—Green's Diary of a Lover of Lit., 1810, 4to, 170. See 169, 171.

Echard retains his politeness, whilst not seeking to disguise his opinion, when he calls May's History "one of the genteelest and handsomest libels of those times." See also Fuller's Worthies, ed. 1840, iii. 259, and authorities cited below. As an amusing contrast to Green's and Echard's decisions, read the following:

"We know of but one work of English contemporary history not dashed with lies, as Dryden expresses it,—but one reasonably free from that spirit of party which leads to the concealment of truth, or a misrepresentation of circumstances: we allude to the 'History of the Long Parliament,' by May, the poet and Parliamentary Secretary, who wrote, as he has beautifully said, of a 'war that divided the understandings of men, as well as their affections, in so high a degree that scarce could any virtue gain due applause, any reason give satisfaction, or any relation obtain credit, unless amongst men of the same side.'"—Lon. Athenæum, Dec. 26, 1840, 1022: The Life and Times of Montrose, by Mark Napier.

Mayers, Walter, 1790–1828, minister of the Chapel of Ease, Old Brentford, 1814; removed to Bampton, 1822, and to Over-Worton, 1823. Serms., with a Brief Memoir of his Life, Lon., 1831, 8vo.

Mayhew, Augustus, one of the "Brothers [Augustus, Edward, Henry, Horace, and Thomas] Mayhew," was associated with Henry and Horace in the authorship of several popular works. See MAYHEW, HENRY; MAYHEW, HORACE. Augustus Mayhew has recently published Paved with Gold, or The Romance and Reality of the London Streets; an Unfashionable Novel, with Illustrations by Phiz: completed, March, 1858.

Mayhew, Edward, one of the "Brothers Mayhew," has contributed to the magazines and newspapers, written a number of dramatic pieces, aided his brothers in the production of several works, and given to the world in his own name—1. On the Mouth of the Horse, Lon., 1849, 8vo. With col'd plates. 2. Dogs, their Management, &c., 1854, p. 8vo. Mr. Henry William Herbert (see p. 830 of this Dictionary) has recently pub. a work on the Dog, compiled from Lt.-Col. W. N. Hutchinson's Dog-Breaking (see p. 928 of this Dictionary) and the works of Dinks and Mayhew, (supra.) To Mr. Mayhew we are also indebted for the 29th edit. of Francis Clater's Farrier, and the 10th edit. of the same writer's Cattle-Doctor, (see p. 393 of this Dictionary.)

Mayhew, Experience, 1673–1758, minister at Martha's Vineyard, was a great-grandson of the excellent Governor Thomas Mayhew. 1. Serm., 1724. 2. Indian Converts, 1727, 8vo. See Rich's Bibl. Amer. Nova, i. 41; Bancroft's Hist. U. States, ii. 96. 3. Letter on the Lord's Supper, 1741. 4. Grace Defended, 1744, 4to. He made a new version of the Psalms and the Gospel according to St. John into the Indian language.

Mayhew, Henry, b. 1812, in London, one of the "Brothers Mayhew," one of the founders of Punch, and of its predecessor Figaro in London, is the author of several dramatic pieces, has contributed to many periodicals, had perhaps some share in the composition of several works by his brothers Augustus and Horace, (see MAYHEW, HORACE,) and has pub. a large number of books, (many without his name,) among which are the following: 1. What to Teach, and How to Teach It, 1842. 2. 1851; or, The Adventures of Mr. and Mrs. Sandboys and Family, 1851, 8vo. Illustrated by G. Cruikshank. 3. London Labour and London Poor, [in the Nineteenth Century,] 1851, 2 vols. 8vo. Pub. in numbers. The first papers originally appeared in the London Morning Chronicle. Still (1858) incomplete. See Lon. Athenæum, 1851, 1199.

"Mayhew has given us the diagnosis of London street-life with an analytical precision quite scientific. . . . A body of the most curious information is brought together, which reveals a world of facts appalling to the sensibilities and wonderfully suggestive to the political economist."—H. T. Tuckerman's Month in England, 222.

So long as the paupers of Great Britain are permitted to spend about £20 per head—for each man, woman, and child—on intoxicating beverages, so long will crime and misery press heavily upon the energies of the industrial portion of the population. The great problem for political economists—we say nothing of moral or religious considerations—is this: In what way can the evils of Intemperance be effectually extirpated?

4. The Mormons, or Latter-Day Saints: a Contemporary History, 1852, cr. 8vo. Anon. 5. The Story of the Peasant-Boy Philosopher, 1854, 12mo; 1855, 12mo; 1856, 12mo. Founded on the life of James Ferguson.

"Told with the grace and feeling of Goldsmith, and by one who has that knowledge of science which Goldsmith lacked. It is as if Brewster and poor 'Goldy' had combined to produce this instructive and beautifully-told tale."—Lon. Era.

6. The Wonders of Science, 1855, '56, 18mo. Founded on the life of Sir Humphrey Davy.

"Though written for boys, the volume may be profitably consulted by both sexes and all ages."—Lon. Athen., 1855, 1464.

Also highly commended by the Literary Gazette, Critic, Examiner, &c.

7. The Great World of London. Of this serial, nine numbers had appeared by December, 1856.

"A book for all classes and all places. Mr. Mayhew has opened for himself a new way to fame. . . . In Mr. Mayhew's hands, so vast is his view, so minute is his knowledge, the theme appears almost virgin. This art of novelty springs from the originality of the observations on which the work is based. . . . The 'Great World of London' deserves and should command success."—Lon. Athenæum, 1856, 428.

Mr. Mayhew has made many praiseworthy efforts for the reformation of the criminal and the improvement of the condition of the virtuous poor; and it will be a standing reproach to the Government and people of England should these philanthropic exertions come to naught or be restricted in their influence for want of due encouragement.

"We have long been in want of a 'Young People's Author,' and we seem to have the right man in the right place in the person of Mr. Mayhew."—Lon. Athenæum.

"An excellent purpose very satisfactorily fulfilled."—N. York Criterion, 1856, 201.

Mayhew, Jonathan, D.D., 1720–1766, the son of the Rev. Experience Mayhew, (ante,) and great-great-grandson of Governor Thomas Mayhew, was one of the first to resist the arbitrary exactions of Great Britain, and one of the most influential agents in the promotion of the American War of Independence. He was born at Martha's Vineyard; graduated at Harvard College, 1744; was ordained the minister of the West Church in Boston, June 16, 1747, and retained this post until his death. He pub. a number of serms. (many of them of a patriotic character) and some controversial tracts. Among the best-known of his productions are the following: 1. Seven Serms., 1749, 8vo. 2. A Discourse concerning Unlimited Submission and Non-Resistance to the Higher Powers, 1750, 8vo. See Mr. Bancroft's notice of this sermon, and his eloquent tribute to Mayhew, in his Hist. of the United States, iv. 60–62. 3. Serms., 1756, 8vo. 4. Thanksgiving Serm. for the Repeal of the Stamp Act, 1766. 5. Serms. to Young Men, 1767, 2 vols. 12mo. See A Memoir of the Life and Writings of Rev. Jonathan Mayhew, D.D., by Alden Bradford, 1838; Rich's Bibl. Amer. Nova, i. 140, 145, 153.

"His works already published will transmit his name to posterity under the endearing character of a steady and able advocate for religious and civil liberty, and of a firm believer, as well as constant practiser, of a pure and undefiled religion as contained in the Scriptures."—Memoirs of Thomas Hollis: Character of Dr. Mayhew.

Mayhew, Thomas, one of the "Brothers Mayhew," early distinguished himself in the cause of cheap educational literature. He started The Penny National Library, —a series of books at a penny per number. Among these were Penny Dictionaries, Penny Grammars, Penny Black stones, Penny Algebras, &c. After losing £10,000 in this laudable enterprise, the projectors very naturally lost patience also; and the public were left to get their education as themselves or their neglectful Government might see fit. Mayhew's idea has been to some extent carried out by the Messrs. Chambers and other worthy benefactors to the public mind. Mr. Mayhew was for some time editor of the Poor Man's Guardian, and has been editor of and contributed to other periodicals.

Maylem, John, d. 1742, aged about 47, graduated at Harvard College 1715, pub. two poems. 1. The Conquest of Louisburg, 1758, 8vo, pp. 16. 2. Gallic Perfidy, 1758, 8vo. Some of his unpub. poems are preserved in the Philadelphia Library. See Duyckincks' Cyc. of Amer. Lit., i. 432.

Maynard, Sir John, M.P., 1602?–1690, a native of Tavistock, Devonshire, educated at Exeter College, Oxford, was made Serjeant-at-Law 1653, was Serjeant to Oliver Cromwell, Richard Cromwell, and Charles II., and in 1689 was appointed one of the Lords-Commissioners of the Great Seal under William III. Burnet tells us that, on Maynard's first waiting on the latter sovereign, the prince, noticing his great age, (eighty-seven,) observed that he must have outlived all the lawyers of his time. On which the ancient wit immediately replied that "he had liked to have outlived the law itself if his highness had not come over." A more courtly speech was never uttered. Sir John pub. a number of speeches and political tracts, 1641–82, and some of his Reports have been printed. See Athen. Oxon.; Brit. Biog.; Burnet's Own Times; Noble's Memoirs of Cromwell, vol. i. p. 435; Lysons's Environs, vol. ii.; Warburton's Letters, 4th ed., 154; Marvin's Leg. Bibl., 508.

"He went through the whole reign of Charles and James II. with the same steady pace and the same adherence to his party; but by his party I rather mean presbytery for the sake of civil liberty than to civil liberty for the sake of presbytery."—Bishop Warburton.

Mayne, John, 1759–1836, a native of Dumfries, Scotland, gained considerable reputation as a poet. He was editor of the London Star, and contributed to a number of periodicals. 1. The Siller Gun; a Poem, (Dumfries,) twelve stanzas on a quarto page: expanded, in two years, to two cantos; in 1780, enlarged to three cantos, and pub. in Ruddiman's Magazine; pub. in London, enlarged to four cantos, with Notes and a Glossary, 1808, 12mo; pub in Edinburgh, enlarged to five cantos, 1836, 12mo.

"It surpasses the efforts of Ferguson, and comes near to those of Burns."—Sir Walter Scott on the ed. of 1808: note to Lady of the Lake.

"You are no less happy in those occasional strokes of a delicate and tender nature which take the reader as it were by surprise, and greatly enhance the effect of the general ludicrous strain of the composition,—as where, after representing some of the finest of the old Scottish airs, you add,—a thought not unworthy of Milton,—

'He play'd in tones that suit Despair
When beauty dies.'"

—Lord Woodhouselee to Mayne: notice of ed. of 1808.

"Poor John Mayne's Poem! Would the blameless man were alive, to see under our hand the praise he heard from our lips,—and smiled to hear; but a tear falls on these lines,—

2. Glasgow; a Descriptive Poem in Scottish Verse, illustrated with Notes, 1803, 8vo.

"It is a work of considerable merit, and all the more worthy of attention that it describes a state of men and things that has utterly passed away. Mayo, William Starbuck, M.D., b. 1812, at Ogdensburg, New York, a descendant of the Rev. John Mayo, who emigrated to New England in 1630, took his medical degree in 1833, subsequently travelled in Spain, Africa, and other countries, and has for some years past resided in the city of New York. 1. Kaloolah, or Journeyings to the Djébel Kumri; an Autobiography of Jonathan Romer. Edited by W. S. Mayo, M.D., N. York, 1849, 8vo; Lon., 1851, 12mo; 1855, 12mo. This work—which is in reality a romance by Dr. Mayo—has had extraordinary success in the United States: 10,000 copies were sold in a short period.

"By far the most attractive and entertaining book we have read since the days we were fascinated by the chef-d'œuvre of Defoe o. the graceful inventions of the Arabian Nights. It is truly an American novel,—not wholly American in scenery, but American in character and American in sentiment."—U. S. Mag. and Democratic Review.

"We have never read a work of fiction with more interest, and, we may add, profit,—combining as it does with the most exciting and romantic adventures a great deal of information of various kinds. The heroine, Kaloolah, is about as charming and delicate a specimen of feminine nature as we recollect in any work of imagination or fancy. We will answer for it that all readers will be perfectly delighted with her."—Jour. of Education.

"Its success was certain and immediate, and not many original works have ever been published in this country which had a larger circulation. It evinces remarkable fertility of invention, is exceedingly interesting, and abounds in clearly-defined, spirited, and occasionally well-finished portraitures. Kaloolah, the heroine, is a fresh and beautiful creation, worthy of any of the masters of fiction."—N. York Internat. Mag., iii. 443, q. v.

The critic of Blackwood does not place so high a value upon Kaloolah:

"Dr. Mayo has considerable versatility of pen: he dashes at every thing, from the ultra-grotesque to the hyper-sentimental, from the wildest fable to the most substantial matter of fact, and, if not particularly successful in some styles, in others he really makes what schoolboys call 'a very good offer.' But the taste of the day is by no means for extravaganza travels after the fashion of Gulliver but without the brilliant and searching satire that lurks in Liliput and Laputa."—Review of Jonathan in Africa, 66–172, q. v.

Mr. Breen cites "Kaloolah" as an instance of the growing custom of adopting "mysterious, out-of-the-way 'titles' for books:" see Modern English Literature, its Blemishes and Defects, 1857, 173–174.

2. The Berber; or, The Mountaineer of the Atlas, 1850, 12mo. This is a story of Spain and Morocco: the scene is laid about the close of the seventeenth century.

"As a novel, it is decidedly better than Kaloolah: it displays greater skill in narration, and is written in the same pure, distinct, and nervous English."—N. York Internat. Mag., iii. 443.

See also Internat. Mag., i. 267.

3. Romance-Dust from the Historic Placer, 1851, 12mo. Dr. Mayo has contributed a number of papers to several of the periodicals. We presume that the public will hear more from him before long.

Mayow, John, LL.D., 1645–1679, a native of Cornwall, educated at Wadham College, Oxford, practised physic, principally at Bath. He pub. the following learned works in Latin:—1. Tractatus Duo de Respiratione prior, alter de Rachitide, Oxf., 1668, 8vo; Leyd., 1671, 8vo. These tracts are included in No. 2. 2. Tractatus (5) Medico-Physici, Oxf., 1674, 8vo. And with the title of Opera Omnia Medica Physica, Leyd., 1681, 8vo; Hague, 1681, 8vo.

"The most valuable part of the whole is the chapter on affinities, in which he appears to have gone much farther than any other chemist of his day, and to have anticipated some of the best-established doctrines of his successors."—Hallam's Lit. Hist. of Europe, 4th ed., 1854, iii. 581, q. v.

Dr. Beddoes drew attention to the merits of this learned author by publishing some extracts from his Tractatus, &c. in 1790, 8vo, under the title of Chemical Experiments and Opinions Extracted from a Work published in the Last Century. Beddoes ascribes to Mayow some of the greatest modern discoveries respecting air. See Athen. Oxon.; Lon. Month. Rev., N. S., vols. xii., xiii.; Brit. Critic, xii. 345.

Mayow, Robert Wynell, 1777–1817, a native of Saltash, educated at Exeter College, Oxford, after serving several curacies in succession, removed to Ardwick, near Manchester, three months previous to his death. 1. Plain Preaching; or, Serms. for the Poor and for People of all Ranks, Lon., 1816, 12mo. 2. Serms. and Miscellaneous Pieces; to which is prefixed a Memoir of his Life, 1822, 12mo.

"It everywhere abounds in marks of Mr. Mayow's pastoral activity, of his honesty of mind, of the sensitiveness of his conscience, and, we will add, of his lively turn for humour. The mixture of humour and strong feeling reminds us sometimes of Sterne."—Lon. Quar. Rev., xxvii. 450–459. q. v.

"Mayow was a feeble copyist of William Law. His sermons are short, sententious, 'full of wise saws and modern instances,' and strangely interlarded with delineations of character after the manner of La Bruyère and Law."—Eclec. Rev., 1828.

Mead, Richard, M.D., 1673–1754, one of the most learned men of his age, son of the Rev. Matthew Mead, (supra,) a native of Stepney, completed his studies under Grævius at Utrecht, and under Herman and Pitcairn at Leyden. He also enjoyed the advantage of an intimacy with the celebrated Boerhaave, which was maintained through life. He took his degrees in philosophy and physic in the University of Padua in 1695; commenced the practice of his profession in his native parish in 1696; was chosen physician of St. Thomas's Hospital, and removed to Crutched Friars, 1703; received the degree of M.D. from the University of Oxford, by diploma, 1707; admitted Fellow of the College of Physicians, 1716, and executed the office of Censor in 1716, 1719, and 1724; appointed Physician-in-Ordinary to George II., 1727. His best-known works are—1. Mechanical Account of Poisons, Lon., 1702, 8vo. Several eds., English and foreign. 2. De Imperio Solis et Luna in Corpore Humano et Morbis inde Oriundis, 1704. In Latin. Anec.; Walpole's Anecdotes of Painting; Dibdin's Bibliomania, ed. 1842, 364–367; Armstrong, John, M.D., p. 69 of this Dictionary.

For almost half a century Mead was at the head of his profession, and for a number of years in receipt of an income from his practice of £5000 to £6000. (In one year it amounted to upwards of £7000.) He had a noble collection of books, pictures, and coins, which were sold after his death for £16,047 12*s.* 10*d.*

"Yes, ever-renowned Richard Mead! thy pharmacopœal reputation is lost in the 'blaze of thy bibliomaniacal glory.' Æsculapius may plant his herbal crown round thy brow, and Hygeia may scatter her cornucopia of roses at thy feet; but what are these things compared with the homage offered thee by the Gesners, Baillets, and Le Longs of old? What avail even the roseate blushes of thousands whom thy medical skill may have snatched from a premature grave, compared with the life, vigour, animation, and competition which thy example infused into the Book-World?"—Dibdin's Bibliomania, ed. 1842, 364–366.

"It is almost impossible," remarks the enthusiastic Dibdin, in a note to the preceding, "to dwell on the memory of this great man without emotions of delight,—whether we consider him as an eminent physician, a friend to literature, or a collector of books, pictures, and coins. Benevolence, magnanimity, and erudition were the striking features of his character. His house was the general receptacle of men of genius and talent, and of every thing beautiful, precious, or rare. His curiosities, whether books, or coins, or pictures, were laid open to the public; and the enterprising student and experienced antiquary alike found amusement and a courteous reception. He was known to all foreigners of intellectual distinction, and corresponded both with the artisan and the potentate."

"That most excellent physician and truly great man, Dr. Richard Mead, to whom I am eternally obliged."—Hearne: Gulielmus Nubrigensis, vol. iii. 744, n.

See also Hearne's Alured de Beverley, p. xlv., and his Walter Hemingford, vol. i., xxxv., for some notices of the Mead family.

"Pitcairn and Boerhaave were leaders of the iatro-mathematicians, [school of medicine;] and Mead was reckoned the last of its distinguished patrons."—Hallam's Lit. Hist. of Europe, 4th ed., 1854. iii. 599.

We need hardly say that the veritable Bibliomaniac must possess Bibliotheca Meadiana, 1755, 8vo, (six copies only printed on large paper;) Catalogue of his Pictures sold by Auction, 1775, 8vo; Catalogue of his Pictures and Drawings, 1755, 8vo. Of Mead's liberality of disposition we have already cited instances in our lives of Thomas Carse and John Freind, M.D., in this Dictionary. Pope, who was a frequent guest at Mead's well-furnished table, notices both the professional and bibliomaniacal eminence of his illustrious friend:

> "Rare monkish manuscripts for Hearne alone,
> And books for Mead, and butterflies for Sloan."
> Epist. IV.
> "To keep these limbs and to preserve these eyes, > I'll do what Mead and Cheselden advise."

Rev. and Church Register, (New York,) under the title of Bishop Meade's Recollections.

"These two noble volumes furnish an amount of biographical, historical, and genealogical information which is all the more valuable from its being from a new and almost unexplored field . . . The lack of an index of names will be felt by every student who consults the work, and we can but hope that this need will be at once supplied by the enterprising publishers."—Historical Mag., (Bost.,) Oct. 1857, 318.

The good bishop is the less to be excused for this fatal omission—that of an Index—from the fact that we urged its importance upon him before his book was sent to the printers. "The enterprising publishers" have nothing to do with this matter: the author must supply his Index,—not of "names" only, but of things, and places also; and we shall never have matters right until "enterprising publishers" positively refuse to publish an Indexless book. Mrs. Medberry has also written several "Sabbath school books," pub. anonymously, and contributed articles to a number of journals.

Mede, Joseph, 1586–1638, a native of Berden, Essex, educated at and Fellow of Christ's College, Cambridge, a divine of profound learning, refused all offers of preferment, and retained during his whole life his post of Reader of the Greek Lecture of Sir Walter Mildmay's foundation. As a tutor he was very successful; and, to quote the language of one of his biographers,

"He was universally esteemed an accomplished scholar. He was an acute logician, an accurate philosopher, a skilful mathematician, an excellent anatomist, a great philologer, a master of many languages, and a good proficient in history and chronology."

In Oriental learning especially he was deeply versed. During his lifetime only three of his works were pub.—viz.: 1. Clavis Apocalyptica ex innatis & insitis Visionum Characteribus eruta et demonstrata, Cant., 1627, 4to. Few copies, and privately printed. To this he added, in 1632, In Sancti Joannis Apocalypsin Commentarius, ad amussim Clavis Apocalypticæ. 2. The name Altar anciently given to the Holy Altar, Lon., 1637, 4to. 3. On Churches, or appropriate places for God's Worship, ever since the Apostles' Time; being a Discourse on 1 Cor. ii. 22, 1638, 4to. After his death his Works were pub., 1648–52, 4to; 2d ed., 1664, 2 vols. fol.; 3d ed., 1672, fol.; 4th ed., 1677, fol.; 5th ed., 1686, fol. In the 2d ed. (1664, 2 vols. fol.

much additional matter was introduced from the author's MSS. by Dr. Worthington, (with Preface and an Account of the Author's Life).

"The third, published in 1672, has the reputation of being the best; but that it is so may be doubted, for Dr. Worthington only superintended the one published in 1664, as he died in 1671. That of 1672 is a reprint of 1664, with the following variations: some of the discourses in Book I. are divided into two, as noted below; the discourses on Joel ii. 17 and Matt. v. 23, 24 do not appear in it; and it contains a discourse on Rev. iii. 19, which is not in the edition of 1664."—Darling's Cyc. Bibl., vol. i. 2028.

His Works contain more than fifty discourses, Clavis Apocalyptica, commentaries on other portions of Scripture, epistles to learned correspondents, &c.

"Among his Posthuma, the largest, and which cost him most study, was his treatise about the doctrine of Dæmons."—Dr. Worthington.

The treatise referred to is The Apostasy of the Latter Times, (1642, 4to,) of which new edits. have appeared, one edited by Gregg, Lon., 12mo; one with an Introduc. by Rev. T. R. Birks, 1845, 18mo. It is greatly to be regretted that some one of the enterprising publishers of London—the Bohns, Rivingtons, Parkers, Hatchards, &c., who have given to the modern reader at a small cost the works of many ancient solid English divines—has not issued a new edit. of the Works of "the Pious and Profoundly-learned Joseph Mede." The work upon which Mede's reputation is founded is his Clavis Apocalyptica, written and pub. in Latin; first trans. into English in 1643, and several times since. The last English trans. is that by R. Bransby Cooper,—"from the Latin of the latest Edition of the Rev. Joseph Mede,"—1838, 8vo. See Cooper, R. Bransby. Another trans., "by a clergyman of the Established Church," appeared in 1831, 12mo. The greater part of Bishop Hurd's Tenth Sermon on the Study of the Prophecies is devoted to the consideration of the Clavis Apocalyptica. Referring to the many previous attempts of Biblical critics to explain the Apocalypse, the bishop remarks,

"The issue of much elaborate enquiry was that the book itself was disgraced by the fruitless efforts of its commentators, and on the point of being given up as utterly impenetrable, when a sublime genius arose [Mede] in the beginning of the last century, and surprised the learned world with that great desideratum,—a key to the Revelations."—Hurd's Works, v. 270.

"Mede is universally allowed to have led the way to a correct and rational interpretation of the Apocalypse."—Horne's Bibl. Bib., 1839, 331.

"All subsequent writers have either been indebted to Mede's Key or have found it necessary to combat his views. . . . Mede regards the seven epistles to the Asiatic churches as prophetical. The great object of the key is to point out the order of the several prophecies, and what he calls the synchronisms of the several series of predictions and events. In both he is certainly very successful. He was a millenarian, or a believer in the first resurrection, and in the personal reign of Christ 1000 years before the general resurrection."—Orme's Bibl. Bib.

"It has ever been considered as a rich mine, of which all subsequent learned commentators have made free and good use."—Dr. E. Williams's C. P., 1843, 294.

"He first laid open the method of the Book of Revelation, and led the way to that system of interpretation which, in the main, has been since adopted by the generality of Protestant commentators. . . . Vitringa ably discusses and refutes some of Mede's interpretations: see also Dean Woodhouse."—Bickersteth's C. S., 1844, 248.

"The fame of Mede has rested, for the most part, on his interpretations of the Apocalypse. . . . Those of Mede have been received with favour by late interpreters."—Hallam's Lit. Hist. of Europe, 1854, ii. 357.

"Modern expositors of the prophecies contained in the Revelation and book of Daniel have properly availed themselves of the lights held out to them by this great divine."—Bishop Watson.

Nor should Mede's other productions be neglected:

"Joseph Mede," remarks Dr. Williams, "was a man of deep piety and of extraordinary learning. His works—all of which are singularly curious and instructive—afford most important assistance to those who are engaged in studying the more difficult parts of the prophetic writings. His Life, which is prefixed to the folio edition of his works, is an invaluable piece of literary history. A correct reprint of Mede is at present greatly needed."—Christian Preacher, 1843, 358.

"The writings of the pious, learned, and modest Mede, who died in 1638, remain still invaluable monuments of sanctified learning and a treasury of instruction."—Bickersteth's C. S., 1844, 248.

"It is strictly and mainly because 'Leonilda' is a poem,—a work with a beginning, middle, and end,—a theme which is adorned, and not checked, by episodes,—a subject in which fancy is the framework of contemplation, as it should always be,—that we place it among the best poems of the year. We could, if we choose, endeavour to make the fame of Felix Meldred by quoting a series of illustrious aphorisms or a string of splendid figures. Many poets, destitute of construction, gain applause in this way; but we desire to rest his fame on higher grounds."—Lon. Critic.

Mellen, Grenville, 1799–1841, a son of the late Chief-Justice Prentiss Mellen, LL.D., (post,) was a native of Biddeford, Maine; educated at Harvard College, 1813; studied law and practised at North Yarmouth from 1823 to '28. He subsequently spent five or six years in Boston, and afterwards removed to New York, where he resided, with occasional intervals of absence, for the rest of his life. In the summer of 1840 he made a voyage to Cuba for the benefit of his health, but rapidly declined after his return, and died in September of the following year. 1. Our Chronicle of Twenty-Six; a Satire, 1827. 2. Glad Tales and Sad Tales, 1829. This is a collection of prose papers originally pub. in periodicals. 3. The Martyr's Triumph, Buried Valley, and other Poems, 1833 Among the best-known of his minor productions are: 4. Ode for the Celebration of the Battle of Bunker Hill, June 17, 1825, 1825, pp. 16. Reviewed by John Everett in the N. Amer. Rev., xxii. 209. 5. The Rest of Empire; a Poem delivered before the Peace Society of Maine at Portland, 1826. 6. The Light of Letters; an Anniversary Poem before the Athenian Society of Bowdoin College, 1828. In 1839, he established in New York The Monthly Miscellany; but a few numbers only saw the light. He was a contributor to the (Cambridge) United States Literary Gazette, and to other periodicals. Critical notices of his poetical writings will be found in the Amer. Quar. Rev., xxii. 194; Amer. Month. Rev., iv. 317; South. Lit. Mess., ii. 403. The editor of the London Literary Journal remarked recently (we write in 1857) of our author's stanzas to the Clouds,

"This poem, by Mr. Mellen, an American writer, would have reflected credit on any one of the famous names in Old England."

Dr. Griswold did not estimate Mellen's poetical genius at so high a rate:

"As a poet he enjoyed a higher reputation in his lifetime than his works will preserve. They are without vigour of thought or language, and are often dreamy, mystic, and unintelligible. In his writings there is no evidence of creative genius; no original, clear, and manly thought; no spirited and natural descriptions of life or nature; no humour, no pathos, no passion; nothing that appeals to the common sympathies of mankind."—Poets and Poetry of America, 16th ed., 1855, 267.

"The muse of Mellen delights in the beauties, not in the deformities, of nature: she is more inclined to celebrate the virtues than denounce the vices of man."—Amer. Quar. Rev., xxii. 195.

Melmoth, William, 1666–1743, a bencher of Lincoln's Inn, in conjunction with Peere Williams was the pub. of Vernon's Reports (see Vernon, Thomas) by order of the Court of Chancery, but is best known by his work entitled The Great Importance of a Religious Life, of which nearly 50,000 copies were sold within twenty years after the first publication: more than 100,000 copies were disposed of between 1743 and '82. Horace Walpole, in his Royal and Noble Authors, erroneously ascribes this work to the first Earl of Egmont. It is now but little known. The last. edit., privately printed, Lon., 1849, r. 8vo, and intended for presents to the Benchers of Lincoln's Inn, was never completed,—the Index only reaching as far as Le Clerc in letter L. Why this neglect? See Darling's Cyc. Bibl., i. 2040. See also Walpole's R. and N. Authors; Memoirs of a Late Eminent Advocate, (Mr. Melmoth,) 1796, 8vo, (by his son, post;) Nichols's Lit. Anec.; Lon. Gent. Mag., lxxxiii.

Melmoth, William, 1710–1799, son of the preceding, appointed a Commissioner of Bankrupts in 1756, passed his life chiefly in retirement at Shrewsbury and Bath. 1. Letters (74) on several Subjects, by Sir Thomas Fitzosborne, [Melmoth,] Lon., 1742, 8vo; 1749, 2 vols. 8vo; 14th ed., Lon., 1814, 8vo; Boston, Mass., 1805, 12mo. These Letters, once "much admired for the elegance of their language and their just and liberal remarks on various topics, moral and literary," are now almost entirely neglected. 2. Trans. of the Letters of Pliny, 1746, 2 vols. 8vo. Reprinted in 2 vols. in 1747, '48, '57, '70, '86, '96, 1807.

"The letters of Pliny derive an additional value in our eyes from his being the only authenticated account preserved by the classics of the primitive Christians."—Melmoth.

"A translation supposed to equal the original both in beauty and tone."—Dr. Adam Clarke.

"One of the few translations that are better than the original."—Dr. Warton, in a note on Pope's works.

Dr. Birch, in his Life of Tillotson, had made nearly the same remark. An eminent critic observes of the translation of the Letters of Pliny by the Earl of Orrery,

"Though this version has been superseded by the labours of Melmoth, it may still occasionally be referred to with advantage."—Dr. Drake.

See Boyle, John, Earl of Cork and Orrery; and see No. 4, infra. 3. Trans. of the Letters of Cicero to several of his Friends, with Remarks, 1753, 3 vols. 8vo; 1778, 3 vols. 8vo; 1789, 3 vols. 8vo; 1814, 2 vols. 8vo. See No. 4. 4. Trans. of Cato, or An Essay upon Old Age; and Lælius, or an Essay on Friendship; with Remarks, 1773–77, 2 vols. 8vo. The Cato was reprinted, 1777, '85, 8vo. The Lælius was reprinted, 1785, 8vo.

"William Melmoth, Esq., a most elegant and distinguished writer, 'near half an age with every good man's praise.' His translations of Cicero and of Pliny will speak for him while Roman and English eloquence can be united. Mr. Melmoth is a happy example of the mild influence of learning on a cultivated mind; I mean of that learning which is declared to be the aliment of youth and the delight or the consolation of declining years. Who would not envy this 'fortunate old man' his most finished translation and comment on Tully's Cato? or, rather, who would not rejoice in the refined and mellowed pleasures of so accomplished a gentleman and so liberal a scholar?"—Pursuits of Literature, 1797, ed. 1812, r. 4to, 360, n.

"The works of Melmoth—in particular his letters and translations of Cicero and Pliny—are remarkable for smoothness and elegance of composition."—Historical View of Eng. Lit.: Goodhugh's E. G. Lib. Man., 155.

"Translations are in general the bane of every language; but such translations as those of Melmoth bring both our language and our learning in their debt."—Lon. Month. Rev.

In 1847–48, the same house pub., in two large octavo vols., Sermons of Henry Melvill, comprising all the Discourses published by Consent of the Author; edited by the Rt. Rev. C. P. MacIlvaine, D.D. Contents vol. i. (pp. 416): I–275, Editor's Preface, and the 28 Serms. contained in the vol. pub. 1838; (supra;) 276–416, 12 Miscellaneous Serms. Vol. ii. (pp. 382): Serms. on Certain of the Less Prominent Facts and References in Sacred Story: First Series, 5–133, 14 Serms.; Second Series, 135–382, 14 Serms. The two vols. contain in all, it will be noticed, 68 sermons. Messrs. S. & S. have also pub. a vol. entitled Melvill's Sermons on Public Occasions, 8vo; and another, entitled Bible Thoughts, taken from Melvill's Sermons, edited by Rev. Dr. Milnor, 18mo, has been pub. in New York. Mr. Melvill for many years enjoyed the reputation of being "the most popular preacher in London." We give some brief notices of his characteristics as a preacher:

"He has published several volumes of sermons, which, although written in a highly imaginative and eloquent strain, are amongst the most admirable specimens of practical divinity in the English language."—Roose's Ecclesiastica: The Church, her Schools and Clergy, Lon., 1842, 8vo.

"As sermons they are defective, we should say, in simplicity and directness of style,—especially in close and pungent appeals to the conscience. But as specimens of beauty and finish in composition they are not often excelled. The preacher's eloquence seems too artificial, and his matter is often too speculative and abstruse; but his phraseology is figurative and richly ornate, his analogies exceedingly happy, his arrangement (though not sufficiently marked) natural and easy, his sentences are nicely balanced, and his periods smoothly rounded; and yet, with all their polish, force is not sacrificed, and, what is better than all, the scriptural or evangelical element is not wanting."—Fish's Pulpit Eloquence of the Nineteenth Century, N. York, 1857, 503–504.

"Popular, evangelical, and useful, with many thoughts gathered from other preachers and made striking by his own eloquence."—Bickersteth's C. S., 1844, 494.

"For real power, for thought, and for eloquence, rarely—indeed, but too rarely—does the world see such volumes as Mr. Melvill's."—British Magazine.

The following comments by our valued friend the Bishop of Ohio strike us as eminently judicious, and well worthy the consideration of all who enter the sacred desk:

"Melvill is strictly a preacher upon texts instead of subjects; upon truths as expressed and connected in the Bible, instead of topics as insulated or classified according to the ways of man's wisdom. This is precisely as it should be. . . He who preaches upon subjects in divinity instead of passages of Scripture, fitting a text to his theme instead of extracting his theme from his text, will soon find that, in the ordinary frequency of parochial ministrations, he has gone the round and traced all the great highways of his field: and what to do next, without repeating his course or changing his whole mode of proceeding, he will be at a great loss to discover. Distinct objects in the preacher's message, like the letters in his alphabet, are few,—few when it is considered that his life is to be occupied in exhibiting them. But their combinations, like those of the letters in the alphabet, are innumerable."—Bishop McIlvaine: Pref. to Melvill's Serms., ed. 1838, 6, 7.

The author of Pen-Pictures of Popular English Preachers was greatly delighted with the reverend gentleman's eloquence:

"Hearing Mr. Melvill was like walking, as did Aladdin, through avenues on either side of which were naught but glittering treasures. His style was ornamented to the utmost; yet it was evident enough that elaboration had been sedulously practised. Indeed, we have heard that Mr. Melvill writes and rewrites his sermons until they arrive at his standard of perfection; and a high standard it is. A week, it is said, he not unfrequently devotes to the composition of a single discourse; and we can easily believe it, for every sermon he delivers is characterised by the most minute attention to every portion thereof. There is no sentence but what is exquisitely balanced, no period which is not elegantly rounded: every simile is perfect and apt, every descriptive passage is graphic in the extreme. Yet, with all this polish, the power is not impaired: the force is not lost in the polish. Rapidly proceeds the orator, never for a moment flagging nor becoming commonplace: as soon as one rainbow begins to fade, another as brilliant succeeds it:

> 'Like the waves of the summer, when one dies away, > Another as bright and as shining comes on'

"The fountain from whence this stream of magic eloquence springs appears to be exhaustless. For three-quarters of an hour the listeners in the solemn aisle appear spell-bound; and, indeed, they are so, for they are charmed by the so potent eloquence of a master of his art. At length the music of the preacher's voice begins to die away, and, as it ceases altogether, a suppressed murmur of approbation runs through the church,—a murmur which elsewhere would have burst into a shout of applause."—Lon., 1852, 293–295.

The lively author of Random Recollections devotes a large space in his Metropolitan Pulpit to a description of Mr. Melvill's personal and pastoral characteristics:

"He is certainly the greatest rhetorician among our metropolitan preachers. His figures are often bold and happy, and give an effect to his matter which it would not otherwise produce. He clothes the most commonplace ideas in language which is so rich in the ornaments of rhetoric that they are often mistaken for conceptions of the most brilliant character. He is much too ample as well as laboured in his illustrations. If he hit on a striking idea, the chance is that, in the plenitude of his anxiety to exhibit that idea in every possible light, he will so far overwork it as to weaken the impression which a less ample illustration could not fail to have made. He is exceedingly partial to the use of analogy in addressing his hearers. He illustrates and enforces the truths of religion by the incidents and occurrences of ordinary life. And his analogies are often exceedingly happy; at times they are particularly striking. . . . Mr. Melvill seldom makes any formal division of his subject. You seldom hear of first, second, or third places in his discourses. His arrangement has much of the essay-form in it. His exordiums are much longer than is common among the clergy of the Church of England. They usually occupy from five to seven minutes in the delivery. His sermons altogether do not occupy more than three-quarters of an hour; but such is the rapidity of his utterance that he speaks as much in that time as another preacher, speaking at the average rate, would do in a full hour. . . . He arrests the hearer's attention the instant he commences, and carries him with him, a willing captive, to the close of his sermon. So far, indeed, from the audience being pleased at their restoration to liberty,—that is, at Mr. Melvill's concluding his discourse,—they are sorry he does not continue longer. They would willingly listen to him for another three-quarters of an hour, or even for twice that time, were it not that they would know the effort must be physically exhausting to himself. They would even most cheerfully—a thing which can be said of few preachers and few sermons—sit to hear the same discourse delivered to them a second time. There is a sustained earnestness and animation of manner in Mr. Melvill's pulpit-ministrations which are not to be found in that of any other metropolitan preacher which can be named; and yet the fervour of his manner does not consist in any thing peculiar in his gesticulation. Of gesticulation, indeed, in the sense in which the term is usually understood, he is very sparing. . . . It is chiefly the tones of his clear and flexible though not powerful voice, the emphasis of his pronunciation, and the hurried manner of his speaking, that impress the hearer with a conviction of his earnestness and fervour. To understand what impression may be produced, or how earnest a minister may appear in the pulpit without having recourse to any thing like preposterous or even liberal gesticulation, it is only necessary to hear Mr. Melvill."—Vol. i., 1839, 6, 10, 12, 14.

Nothing can redound more to the credit of a minister of the gospel of Christ than such testimony as the following:

"It affords me pleasure to state that he is most exemplary and indefatigable in his visits to the sick and dying, and that in such cases he is as prompt in visiting the poor as the rich. I have reason to believe that he has been eminently useful in this way. It is highly to his credit that, in order that he may have the more time to devote to his visits to the sick and dying, he declines innumerable invitations of a most pressing nature to dinner and other parties."—Ibid., 18.

Melville, Andrew, 1545–1622, a native of Baldovy, near Montrose, one of the most distinguished of the Scotch Reformers, and a profound scholar, was in succession Professor of Humanity in the Academy of Geneva, Principal of Glasgow College, 1574, Principal of St. Mary's College, University of St. Andrew's, 1580, and Professor in the University of Sedan, where he finished his useful life. Among his publications are Carmen Mosis, ex Deuteron. Cap. XXXII., quod ipsi moriens Israëli tradidit ediscendum et Cantandum perpetuò, Latina Paraphrasi illustratum. Cui addita sunt nonnula Epigrammata, et Jobi Cap. III., Latino Carmine redditum, Basil, 1574, 8vo.

"The Carmen Mosis is unquestionably the finest poem in the collection, or, perhaps, of any that Melville wrote. It is worthy of the scholar of Buchanan, and deserves a place among the productions of those modern writers who have attained great excellence in Latin poetry. . . . The language is classically pure, and at the same time not unsuited to the sacredness of the theme; the versification is correct and smooth; and the imagery is managed with boldness and delicacy."—DR. MACCRIE: Life of Andrew Melville.

This work is inserted in the Deliciæ Poetarum Scotorum, tom. ii. Melville composed some other poetical versions of the Scriptures; among which is a metrical paraphrase of the Epistle to the Hebrews, which still remains in MS. in the British Museum.

"The Scots, in consequence of receiving very frequently a continental education, cultivated Latin poetry with ardour. It was the favourite amusement of Andrew Melville, who is sometimes a mere scribbler, at others tolerably classical and spirited. His poem on the Creation, in Deliciæ Poetarum Scotorum, is very respectable."—Hallam's Lit. Hist. of Europe, 4th ed., 1854, ii. 147. And see ii. 20, and i. 521.

"If the love of pure religion, rational liberty, and polite letters form the basis of national liberty and happiness, I know no individual, after her reformer, from whom Scotland has received greater benefits, and to whom she owes a deeper debt of gratitude than to Andrew Melville."—DR. Melville, Herman, b. Aug. 1, 1819, in the city of New York, a descendant of an ancient Scotch family, in his 18th year made a voyage from New York to Liverpool, and back home, before the mast, and liked his marine experience sufficiently to embark on a whaling-vessel for the Pacific, Jan. 1, 1841. About July of the next year, the vessel arrived at Nukaheva, one of the Marquesas Islands, and Melville, with a fellow-sailor, who like himself was tired of strait quarters and a tyrannical captain, embraced the opportunity of leaving the ship without waiting for the usual formality of a discharge. Falling into the hands of a warlike race who inhabit the Typee Valley, Melville was detained a prisoner for four months, when he was unexpectedly rescued by the crew of a Sidney whaler. After passing several months in the Society and Sandwich Islands, the adventurer shipped on board the frigate United States and arrived at Boston in October, 1844, having been absent from home nearly three years. In 1847, Mr. Melville was married to a daughter of Chief-Justice Shaw, of Boston, and has for some years resided at Berkshire, Massachusetts. That he was no unobservant spectator of the peculiar phases of society which he encountered during his travels, we have ample evidence in several descriptive volumes which he has since given to the world. 1. Typee: a Peep at Polynesian Life; or, Four Months' Residence in a Valley of the Marquesas, Lon. and N. York, 1846, 12mo; 1850, 12mo; 1855, 12mo. Trans. into several European languages.

"The whole narrative is most interesting, most affecting, and most romantic."—Lon. Gent. Mag., 1846, Pt. 2, 66.

"Since the joyous moment when we first read Robinson Crusoe—and believed it all, and wondered all the more because we believed—we have not met with so bewitching a work as this narrative of Herman Melville's."—John Bull.

"This is really a very curious book. A little colouring there may be here and there; but the result is a thorough impression of reality."—Lon. Examiner.

"The book is a great curiosity in one point of view: it is the first account that has been published of a residence among the natives of the Polynesian Islands, by a person who has lived with them in their own fashion, and, as near as may be, on terms of social equality."—Lon. Spectator.

"That Mr. Melville will favour us with his further adventures we have no doubt whatever. We shall expect them with impatience and receive them with pleasure. He is a companion after our own hearts. His voice is pleasant; and if we could see his face we are sure we should find it a cheerful one."—Lon. Times.

"Musing the other day over our matutinal hyson, the volume itself was laid before us, and we suddenly found ourselves in the entertaining society of Marquesan Melville, the phœnix of modern voyagers,—sprung, it would seem, from the mingled ashes of Captain Cook and Robinson Crusoe. . . . The book is excellent, quite first-rate,—the 'clear grit,' as Mr. Melville's countrymen would say."—Blackw. Mag., lxi. 754–767.

"Fiction so largely entered into the composition of the books [Typee and Omoo] that they could not be regarded as matter-of-fact narrative. Both these works contain a few opening chapters descriptive of foremast-life in whaling-ships, which are exceedingly interesting and striking."—Dubl. Univ. Mag. (Copied into the Bost. Liv. Age, xlviii. 564.)

"In noticing Mr. Melville's book our object is to show that his statements respecting the Protestant mission in Tahiti are perversions of the truth, that he is guilty of deliberate and elaborate misrepresentation, and . . . that he is a prejudiced, incompetent, and truthless witness."—Eclec. Rev., 4th Ser., xxviii. 425.

This article—which, as may be surmised from its opening paragraph quoted above, is not at all complimentary to the author of Typee and Omoo—was copied into the Bost. Liv. 3. Mardi, and a Voyage Thither, N. York, 1849, 2 vols. 12mo; Lon., 1849, 3 vols. p. 8vo.

"Sadly were we disgusted on a perusal of a rubbishing rhapsody entitled Mardi, and a Voyage Thither. . . . Why, what trash is this!—mingled, too, with attempts at a Rabelaisian vein, and with strainings at smartness, the style of the whole being affected, pedantic, and wearisome exceedingly. . . . Mr. Melville has evidently written his unintelligible novel to try the public's patience."—Blackw. Mag., lxvi. 172, 173.

"It is, in our estimation, one of the saddest, most melancholy, most deplorable and humiliating perversions of genius of a high order in the English language."—Dubl. Univ. Mag. (Copied into the Bost. Liv. Age, xlviii. 564.)

4. Redburn; his First Voyage: being the Sailor-Boy Confessions and Reminiscences of the Son of a Gentleman in the Merchant-Service, N. York, 1849, 12mo; Lon., 1849, 2 vols. p. 8vo.

"Many of the defects of Mardi are corrected in Redburn. We gladly miss much of the obscurity and nonsense that abound in the former work. The style, too, of this one is more natural and manly."—Blackw. Mag., lxvi. 567–580, q. v.

"It contains some clever chapters; but very much of the matter, especially that portion relative to the adventures of the young sailor in Liverpool, London, &c., is outrageously improbable, and cannot be read with either pleasure or profit. This abortive work, which neither obtained nor deserved much success," &c.—Dubl. Univ. Mag. (Copied into Bost. Liv. Age., xlviii. 564.)

"With the exception of some chapters descriptive of commonplace things, the book is very readable and attractive."—Lon. Spectator. (Copied into Bost. Liv. Age, xxiii. 581.)

6. Moby Dick; or, The Whale, N. York, 1851, 12mo; Lon., 1851, 3 vols. p. 8vo.

"It is quite as eccentric and monstrously extravagant in many of its incidents as even 'Mardi;' but it is, nevertheless, a very valuable book, on account of the unparalleled mass of information it contains on the subject of the history and capture of the great and terrible cachalot or sperm-whale."—Dubl. Univ. Mag. (Copied into Bost. Liv. Age, xlviii. 564.)

Mr. Melville commends J. Bennet's Whaling Voyage Round the Globe (Lon., 1835, 2 vols. 8vo) as a reliable authority on the subject of the whale-fishery.

7. Pierre; or, The Ambiguities, 1852, 12mo.

"An unhealthy, mystic romance. . . . It was a decided failure and has not been reprinted in this country."—Lon. Men of the Time. 1856, 547.

"It is one of the most diffuse doses of transcendentalism offered for a long time to the public."—Lon. Athen., 1852, 1265.

After quoting Pierre's apostrophe upon finding a rocking stone in the woods, the passage concluding with—"and slowly Pierre crawled forth, and stood haughtily upon his feet, as he owed thanks to none, and went his moody way" the critic remarks,

"That many readers will not follow 'the moody way' of Pierre is, in our apprehension, not amongst the ambiguities of the age. The present chaotic performance has nothing American about it, except that it reminds us of a prairie in print, wanting the flowers and freshness of the savannahs, but almost equally puzzling to find a way through it."—1266.

8. Israel Potter: His Fifty Years of Exile, N. York, 1855, 12mo; Lon., 1855, 12mo.

This is a reprint, with alterations, of a true story, entitled The Life and Adventures of Israel R. Potter, (pub. in Providence in 1824,) written by Henry Trumbull from Potter's dictation.

"Mr. Melville's books have been, from the outset of his career, somewhat singular, and this is not the least so of the company. . . . Mr. Melville tries for power and command; but he becomes wilder and wilder, and more and more turgid, in each successive book."—Lon. Athen., 1855, 643.

9. The Piazzi Tales, 1856, 12mo. Contents: I. The Piazzi; II. Bartleby; III. Benito Cereno; IV. The Lightning-Rod Man; V. The Encantadas; or, Enchanted Islands; VI. The Bell-Tower. These stories were originally pub. in Putnam's Magazine.

"Who that remembers those charming works of Mr. Melville, 'Typee' and 'Omoo,' will not be glad of an opportunity of meeting him on his 'Piazzi,' while he recites the delightful stories which are contained in the volume before us?"—Lon. Atlas.

10. The Confidence Man: His Masquerade, 1857, 8vo; Lon., 1857, 8vo.

"It required close knowledge of the world, and of the Yankee world, to write such a book, and make the satire acute and telling and the scenes not too improbable for the faith given to fiction. Perhaps the moral is, the gullibility of the great Republic when taken on its own tack. . . . Few Americans write so powerfully as Mr. Melville, or in better English; and we shall look forward with pleasure to his promised continuation of the Masquerade. The First Part is a remarkable work, and will add to his reputation."—Westminster Rev., July, 1857.

"Full of thought, conceit, and fancy, of affectation and originality, this book is not unexceptionably meritorious; but it is invariably graphic, fresh, and entertaining."—Lon. Athen., 1857, 463.

"That prosiness is the last crime of which Herman Melville can be accused will be admitted by all who are familiar with 'Omoo,' 'Typee,' 'Mardi,' 'White Jacket,' and 'Moby Dick.' On the contrary, there is a vividness and an intensity about his style which is almost painful for the constant strain upon the attention; and 'The Confidence Man' is that of all his works which readers will find the hardest nut to crack."—Lon. Critic.

"In this book, philosophy is brought out of its cloisters into the living world: the issue raised is, whether men are to be trusted or suspected. . . . It is a strangely-diversified narration of events taking place during the voyage of a Mississippi river-boat; a cosmopolitan philanthropist, the apostle of a doctrine, being the centre and inspiration of the whole. The charm of the book is owing to its originality and to its constant flow of descriptions, character-sketching, and dialogue, deeply toned and skilfully contrasted."—Lon. Leader.

"There is one point on which we must speak a serious word to Mr. Melville before parting with him. He is too clever a man to be a profane one; and yet his occasional irreverent use of Scripture phrases in such a book as the one before us gives a disagreeable impression. We hope he will not in future mar his wit and blunt the edge of his satire by such instances of bad taste."—Lon. Saturday Rev., May 23, 1857.

We have already made several quotations from a general review of Mr. Melville's works (Nos. 1–7) in the Dublin University Magazine. The critic at the conclusion of his article remarks,

"Herman Melville is undoubtedly an original thinker, and boldly and unreservedly expresses his opinions, often in a way that irresistibly startles and enchains the interest of the reader. He possesses amazing powers of expression: he can be terse, copious, eloquent, brilliant, imaginative, poetical, satirical, pathetic, at will. He is never stupid, never dull; but, alas! he is often mystical and unintelligible,—NOT from any inability to express himself, for his writing is pure, manly English, and a child can always understand what he SAYS,—but the ablest critic cannot always tell what he really MEANS. . . .

"Such is Herman Melville! A man of whom America has reason to be proud, with all his faults; and, if he does not eventually rank as one of her greatest giants in literature, it will not be owing to any lack of innate genius, but solely to his own incorrigible perversion of his rare and lofty gifts."

Mercer, James, 1734–1804, Major R.A., an eminent classical scholar and exquisite poet, who served with great distinction under Prince Ferdinand in Germany, was the son of Thomas Mercer, of Aberdeenshire, whose zealous advocacy of the interests of the Stuarts and his complicity in the Rebellion of 1745 obliged him to retire to France. James Mercer was educated at the University of Aberdeen, under the celebrated Professor Blackwall, and imbibed from his tutor that love of Greek literature which the toils of the camp and the blandishments of the social circle were unable to eradicate in after-years. He retired from the army about 1772, when upon the point of being advanced to the rank of lieutenant-colonel, and, with the exception of a short interval during the war with America, and a few years' residence in the South of France, spent the rest of his life in literary seclusion at Aberdeenshire, occasionally entertaining a few friends attracted alike by the erudition of the military scholar and the extraordinary beauty of Mrs. Mercer, (formerly Miss Katherine Douglass,) whose accomplishments in their kind were not inferior to those of her husband.

"Major Mercer," remarks George Wilson, "in his unambitious retirement cultivates letters with a disinterested love. His beautiful poems were given to the world without his consent; and it was only after his death that the author of them was made known, by commendations flowing from affection but ratified by justice."—Life of Sir James Mackintosh, vol. i. chap. 1.

' Among my few acquaintances at Aberdeen," says Sir James Mackintosh, when reviewing his college-days, "was Major Mercer, an old friend and fellow-soldier of my father during the 'Seven Years' War,' whose little volume of poems, everywhere elegant and sometimes charming, has been published a second time at London, last year. His wife, a sister of Lord Glenbervie, was a beautiful and accomplished woman. He condescended to talk literature with me."—Ibid., vol. i. chap. 1.

The first ed. of the vol. of Poems referred to by Sir James was pub. anonymously, and, as we have seen, without the consent of the author. The second ed., with some additional Poems, appeared in London, 1804, 12mo, and was reviewed by Thomas Thomson in the Edinburgh Review for January, 1805, q. v. for selections.

"From these passages, which have been selected at random," remarks the critic, "the reader may be enabled to form a very fair estimate of the style and peculiar merits of the poems contained in this little volume; and we doubt not that the whole collection will be found to justify the praise we have ventured to bestow upon it. To that praise, however well merited, the excellent author himself can now no longer be sensible; and, by a singular coincidence, we may with characteristical propriety apply to him the lament of a celebrated Scottish poet of the sixteenth century for the loss of a contemporary bard of the same name:

> 'He [i. e. Death] has reft Mersar, his indyte
> That did in luve so lyfly wryte,
> So short, so quick, of sentens hie,
> Timor mortis conturbat me.'"

It would appear that Mercer—a Scot by birth—was a captain of horse in the Parliamentary army, and, after the cessation of hostilities, was dismissed from the service with his pay in arrears to the amount of £900. Against this state of affairs the worthy captain remonstrated with great force. Whether his claim was ever settled, or whether its non-settlement added another instance of the alleged ingratitude of republics, we know not, nor, we imagine, do his descendants.

Meredith, Owen, the nom de plume of Robert, only son of Sir Edward George Earle Lytton Bulwer Lytton, has gained considerable poetical reputation by a volume of poems pub. in 1855, under the title of Clytemnestra, The Earl's Return, The Artist, and other Poems. We extract a few lines from several reviews before us of this volume:

"That this volume indicates remarkable ability in so young a writer as we understand its author to be is unquestionable; but whether that ability includes the exceedingly rare conjunction and balance of intellectual forces which constitute the nature of an original poet is more than we can undertake to determine from the evidence before us."—Edin. Rev., Oct. 1856; New Poets, q. v.

"The author of 'Clytemnestra' may take his rank above the Minor Minstrels. His gifts and his faults are not the gifts and faults of gentlemen 'who write with ease.' He has an eye for colour; his ear is open for the cries of nature; he feels the hush of noon and the silence of midnight; and that which he thinks clearly and feels deeply he can express with rare felicity and power."—Lon. Athen., 1855, 426.

"If one may prophesy with safety of the day by watching the tokens that accompany the dawn, we may predict satisfactory issue from the rich poetical promise which in this volume breaks over the flat waste of contemporary verse."—Lon. Examiner.

"He is yet far from having developed the powers that are in him. Naturalness of expression runs into affectation; the metre is sometimes peculiar in itself, and, from negligence or love of singularity, becomes harsh in the execution; his perception of natural beauty runs wild, and description overlays his theme instead of setting it off; his subjects are not always good in themselves, or else they are improperly treated. But he has the spirit and feeling of a genuine poet; the defects of his volume are such as judgment could have prevented, and in many cases even revision remove."—Lon. Spectator.

Meredith, Royston. Letters to Sir Richard Steele, Lon., 1714, 8vo.

Meredith, Samuel. Trans. of Emérigon's Treatise on Insurance; with an Introduction and Notes, Lon., 1850, r. 8vo.

"Who has equalled Emérigon as a theoretical and practical writer on the Law of Insurance? He has exhausted every topic, so far as materials were within his reach; and upon all new questions his work, for illustration and authorities and usages, is still unrivalled."—JUDGE STORY: N. Amer. Rev., xx. 64, Jan. 1825.

Judge Story had remarked, in N. Amer. Rev., vi. 49, (Nov. 1817,) that "Probably the most perfect theoretical work on Insurance is that of the learned Emérigon, which (strange to tell) has never been translated. . . . We trust that the time is not far distant when Pothier and Emérigon and Varin will be accessible in our native tongue to every lawyer, and will be as familiarly known to them as they are now to the jurists of Continental Europe."

Notwithstanding this hint, Emérigon's Treatise on Insurance did not appear in an English dress until 1850.

"The treatise of Emérigon very far surpasses all preceding works in the extent, value, and practical application of his principles. It is the most didactic, learned, and finished production extant on the subject. . . . In the language of Lord Tenterden, no subject in Emérigon is discussed without being exhausted; and the eulogy is as just as it is splendid."—3 Kent's Com., 428, 8th ed., 1854.

"Meres is certainly much indebted to the thirty-first chapter of the first book of Puttenham's Arte of English Poesie; but he has considerably extended the catalogue of poets; and it should be added that his comparisons are drawn with no small portion of skill and felicity, and that his criticisms are, for the most part, just and tersely expressed."—Drake's Shakspeare and his Times, i. 468.

Merivale, Rev. Charles, late Fellow of St. John's College, Cambridge, is a son of the late John Herman Merivale, Commissioner of Bankruptcy, (post.) 1. Serms. preached at Cambridge, 1838, 8vo; 1839.

"These sermons, which do credit to the author's knowledge and acuteness, afford another proof of the general diffusion of a taste for ecclesiastical learning."—Brit. Magazine.

2. Serms. preached in the Chapel Royal, 8vo. 3. Hist. of Rome under the Romans, 8vo: vols. i., ii., (comprising the period between the establishment of the First Triumvirate and the death of Cæsar,) 1850; 2d ed., 1852; iii., 1851; iv., v., (comprising Augustus and the Claudian Cæsars,) 1856.

"No one could have looked into that agreeable miscellany of scholarship, the Arundines Cami, without becoming aware that Mr. Merivale possesses one qualification at least for an historian of the Romans,—an intimate acquaintance with their language and literature. . . . We have read these volumes with great pleasure, and we close them with even greater expectation. . . . Our readers will perceive that Mr. Merivale's undertaking is nothing less than to bridge over no small portion of the interval between the interrupted work of Arnold and the commencement of Gibbon. He comes, therefore, between 'mighty opposites.' It is praise enough that in this, his first instalment, he proves himself no unworthy successor to the two most gifted historians of Rome whom English literature has yet produced."—Edin. Rev., xcii. 57–94. (Review of vols. i., ii.)

"Mr. Merivale would seem to belong rather to the school of Hallam than to that of Macaulay: in other words, his reflections are, we think, superior to his descriptions, and the ratiocinative element predominates over the imaginative in the composition and style of these volumes. Mr. Merivale does not display the brilliancy or verve of Gibbon or Macaulay; but he evidently has ample powers of doing justice to his subject, and of producing a work on Roman history which will take a very high position in English literature."—Lon. Athen., 1850, 759, 760. (Review of vols. i., ii.)

"The opinion formerly expressed in this journal [supra] of Mr. Merivale's eminent qualifications for the composition of a standard work on the Roman Empire has been strengthened by the perusal of the volume now before us. It displays a happy combination of scholarship without pedantry, erudition invigorated by originality and thoughtful reflection condensed in pure and nervous language."—Ibid., 1852, 137–138. (Review of vol. iii.)

"On the whole, we can recommend these two volumes of Mr. Merivale's History as a scholarly, calm, and unprejudiced representation of the portion of Roman history of which they treat."—Ibid., 1856, 452–453. (Review of vols. iv., v.)

The Hist. of Rome is also highly commended by the London Christian Remembrancer. 4. Fall of the Roman Empire, 1853, p. 8vo. 5. Merivale, John Herman, 1779–1844, father of the Rev. "I cannot conclude," remarks Mr. Merivale, in the Preface to this work, "without expressing my obligations to my friend Mr. Utterson for the use he has enabled me to make of his stores of 'Romaunt,' and for the aid of his pencil in the designs prefixed to each of the following cantos."

As an evidence of his appreciation of Mr. Utterson's friendly offices, Mr. Merivale presented him with a copy of his poem beautifully printed on pure vellum (the only copy so executed). This beautiful book, with a duplicate set of the wood-cuts separately worked off on paper inserted, and coloured by Mr. Utterson, is now—or was recently—the property of Mr. Joseph Lilly, of London, who prices it in his catalogue of July–August, 1857, p. 17, at £12 12*s.* 2. Archbishop Secker, on the other hand, attacked this version with such severity that Dr. Sharpe came out in its defence. We give some other opinions:

Merry, Robert, 1755–1798, a native of London, educated at Christ's College, Cambridge, resided for a long time at Florence, where he was elected a member of the Academy Della Crusca, contributed to the Florence Miscellany, and founded that short-lived school of poetry which met its death at the hands of the ferocious editor of The Quarterly. See GIFFORD, WILLIAM; GREATHEAD, BERTIE. In 1791 Merry married Miss Brunton, a celebrated actress, who in 1796 accompanied him to America. He died suddenly at Baltimore. Mrs. Merry became the wife of Mr. Warren, for many years manager of the Chestnut Street Theatre, Philadelphia. Mr. Merry was the author of a number of poems, some of them signed Della Crusca, and the following dramatic pieces. 1. Ambitious Vengeance, 1790, 8vo. 2. Lorenzo; Tragedy, 1791, 8vo. 3. The Magician No Conjuror; Comic Opera, 1792; not printed. 4. Fenelon; Serious Drama, 1795, 8vo. See Lon. Gent. Mag., 69; Biog. Dramat.

"Merry exercised during twenty years a greater influence than any other individual has ever exercised upon American taste in poetry and other kinds of writing."—DR. R. W. GRISWOLD.

Metcalf, Theron, b. at Franklin, Mass., 1784, graduated at Brown University, 1805, was appointed Reporter of the Supreme Court of Massachusetts, 1839, and Judge in the same Court in 1848. 1. A Digest of the Cases decided in the Supreme Judicial Court of Massachusetts from 1816 to 1823, including the five last volumes of Tyng's and the first of Pickering's Reports, Bost., 1825, 8vo. Pickering's Reports, 1822–40, 24 vols. 8vo, 1824–42, must be added to the above; and also (2.) Metcalf's Reports, 1840–49, 13 vols. 8vo, 1840–51. Mr. Pickering resigned the office of Reporter in 1839, and Mr. Metcalf commenced his labours with the March term, 1840. His Reports are of the very highest character. George Minot's Digest of the Massachusetts Reports, 17 Mass., 24 Pickering, and 5 of Metcalf should accompany the Reports. The Reports of the Supreme Court of Massachusetts are as follows: 17 Massachusetts, vol. i., by E. Williams, 2–16, by Dudley A. Tyng; 24 Pickering; 13 Metcalf; 11 Cushing; 4 Gray, the present Reporter. 3. A Digest of the Decisions of the Courts of Common Law and Admiralty in the United States, vol. i., 1840, r. 8vo, by Theron Metcalf and J. C. Perkins. This valuable work, now completed to 1855, contains 14 vols. royal 8vo,—viz., ii., iii., by George Ticknor Curtis; iv., v., Supplement, by John Phelps Putnam; vi., Table of Cases, by G. P. Sanger; vii.–xiv., Annual Digests, by J. P. Putnam. The annual volumes contain the Equity in addition to the Common Law and Admiralty; and vol. vi. and the subsequent vols. embrace a digest of Little, Brown & Co.'s series of English Law and Equity Reports.

"It is as trustworthy [vols. i.–v.] as any digest I have had occasion to make use of, and will naturally find a place in the library of every careful lawyer."—S. GREENLEAF.

J. P. Putnam's United States Equity Digest from the Earliest Period to the Present Time, 2 vols. r. 8vo, must accompany the preceding 14 vols. The 16 vols. form a complete Digest of all the Reports to 1847,—from which period Mr. Putnam's Annual Digest includes the Common Law, Admiralty, and Equity Reports, with a Table of all the Reports comprised in the Digest, and a Table of all the Cases Reported. 4. With Luther S. Cushing, Supplements to the Revised Statutes of Massachusetts to 1844, 8vo, 1844. Since 1844 the Supplements have been continued annually by Judge Cushing and Horace Gray, Jr.: see pp. 463, 724, ante. Nor should we omit to mention that Judge Cushing's Reports of Contested Elections in the H. of Rep. of Mass. 1780–1834 (1834, 8vo) includes a collection of cases on the same subject by Mr. Metcalf. In 1823, 2 vols. 8vo, Mr. Metcalf edited The General Laws of Massachusetts to 1822, by Asahel Stearns and Lemuel Shaw, Commissioners: see N. Amer. Rev., xvii. 69–91, July, 1823, (by Caleb Cushing.) 5. Maule and Selwyn's Reports: see MAULE, GEORGE, and WILLIAM SELWYN. Mr. Metcalf has also ably edited Russell on Crimes, (see Hoffman's Leg. Stu., 438; Marvin's Leg. Bibl.;) Starkie on Evidence, (see Marvin's Leg. Bibl., 660;) Yelverton's Reports, (see 1 Kent, 538, 8th ed., 1854; Marvin's Leg. Bibl., 757,) &c.; and perhaps no American legal annotator has been rewarded with higher commendations.

"We perceive an increasing propensity, in our own country, to load and overload new editions of professional works with notes of little intrinsic value, or, at most, with notes whose value is materially diminished by the loose and unskilful manner in which they are introduced. There are, however, some exceptions to this remark; and none are entitled to more praise than the learned comments of Mr. Metcalf."—JUDGE JOSEPH STORY: N. Amer. Rev., July, 1826, 13, (Dane's Digest of American Law;) and his Miscell. Works, 1852, 393.

"Mr. Metcalf is one of the soundest, most accurate and learned lawyers of our country. His taste, habits, and powers of mind are peculiarly adapted to legal investigation and analysis."—Law Reporter.

"The annotations with which he has enriched the text submitted to him constitute, generally speaking, the most valuable part of the reprint, and bear the same relation to the text itself which the rules of Mr. Serjeant Williams do to Saunders's Reports. We hazard the conjecture that he has in his desk manuscripts enough to give him a high reputation as a discriminating and philosophical law-writer, would he present them to the public."—GEORGE STILLMAN HILLARD: N. Amer. Rev., xlvi. 73, Jan. 1838; Hoffman's Course of Legal Study.

Mr. Metcalf pub. the Oration at Dedham, July 4, 1810, and An Address to the P. B. Kappa Soc. of Brown University, 1832; pub. 1833. He is also the author of several able articles in the American Jurist,—on The Law of Contracts, &c.

"If we are destined ever to arrive at a perfect theory of nature, it must be founded on a true history of the grand original and a complete knowledge of the prime mover. It was by seizing the grand lever of nature that man was enabled to create the steam-engine, which has brought about a more important revolution in the condition of nations than all the united discoveries of antiquity for thousands of years."—Preface.

Meteyard, Eliza, daughter of the late William Meteyard, Surgeon of the Shropshire Militia, was born in Liverpool, June 21, 1822. She has contributed largely to Hood's Magazine, Tait's Magazine, The People's Journal, Eliza Cook's Journal, and Douglas Jerrold's Weekly Newspaper. The nom de plume of Silverpen, by which she is best known, was first affixed to her articles by Mr. Jerrold. She is an earnest advocate of the cause of social reformers. In addition to several unpublished works, Miss Meteyard has written: 1. Struggles for Fame; a Novel, 1845, 3 vols. p. 8vo. This was written in 1840, and its first title was Scenes in the Life of an Authoress. Before its appearance in book-form it was pub. serially in Tait's Magazine. 2. "Two valuable works, . . . to the truthfulness of which we are glad to add our own testimony: one, and the most important, is Mr. Meyrick's 'Practical Working of the Church of Spain.' This is the experience—and it is the experience of every Spanish traveller—of a thoughtful person as to the lamentable results of unchecked Romanism. Here is the solid, substantial fact. Spain is divided between ultra-infidelity and what is so closely akin to actual idolatry that it can only be controversially, not practically, distinguished from it; and over all hangs a lurid cloud of systematic immorality, simply frightful to contemplate. We can offer a direct and even personal testimony to all that Mr. Meyrick has to say."—Lon. Chris. Remembrancer.

Meyrick, Sir Samuel Rush, Knight, K.H., LL.D., 1783–1848, a descendant of the Meyricks of Bodorgan, in Anglesea, educated at Queen's College, Oxford, adopted the profession of the law, and varied his practice in the Ecclesiastical and Admiralty Courts by collecting suits of ancient armour, which were finally arranged for exhibition at Goodrich Court, Herefordshire. 1. A Critical Inquiry into Ancient Armour as it Existed in Europe, but particularly in England, from the Norman Conquest to the Reign of King Charles II.; with a Glossary of Military Terms of the Middle Ages, 1824,

3 vols. imp. 4to; £21. New and greatly improved ed., corrected and enlarged throughout by the author, with the assistance of Literary and Antiquarian Friends, [Albert Way, Francis Douce, &c.,] 1844, 3 vols. imp. 4to. More than 100 plates; £10 10s. In this new ed. it is thought that the plates are not so carefully illuminated as in the first impression, in which the gold and dead silver have been said to be the nearest approach made in any modern publication to the illuminations of the Middle Ages.

Sir Walter Scott describes this collection as

"The incomparable armoury."

A review of the Critical Inquiry, by Lord Jeffrey, will be found in Edin. Rev. for Jan. 1824, xxxix. 346–363:

"It is not often the fortune," remarks the critic, "of a painful student of antiquity to conduct his readers through so splendid a succession of scenes and events as those to which Dr. Meyrick here successfully introduces us; but he does it with all the ease and gracefulness of an accomplished cicerone."—347.

"Dr. Meyrick's excellence is accuracy, both as regards the plates and the dissertations in the book. We have gone through it carefully, and have really been unable to detect him in a single misconception or deficiency in the knowledge of his topics."—Lon. Quar. Rev.

"Really and truly, the work is admirably executed, and deserves every eulogy."—Lon. Gent. Mag.

4. Engraved Illustrations of Ancient Arms and Armour: a Series of 154 Etchings of the Collection at Goodrich Court, Herefordshire, engraved by Joseph Skelton, and accompanied by Historical and Critical Disquisitions by the possessor, Samuel Rush Meyrick, LL.D., 1830, 2 vols. imp. 4to: £11 11s.

"This work cannot fail, from the high character which the Meyrick Collection has obtained,—and it has been called 'the most instructive collection in Western Europe,'—to be highly acceptable, and more particularly useful to the antiquary, historian, and artist. . . . We should imagine that the possessors of Dr. Meyrick's great work would eagerly add Mr. Skelton's as a suitable illustration. In the first, they have the History of Arms and Armour; in the second work, beautiful engravings of all the details, made out with sufficient minuteness to serve hereafter as patterns for artists or workmen should the specimens now deposited in the Meyrick Collection be unhappily dispersed."—Lon. Gent. Mag.

The collection was inherited by the former owner's second-cousin, Colonel Meyrick: we hope that when he is forced to leave it he will take care that the British Museum is remembered in his last will and testament.

5. Lewis Dunn's Heraldic Visitation of Wales, 1846, 2 vols. 4to. Edited by Sir S. R. M. Printed for the Welsh MSS. Society. Reviewed in Lon. Gent. Mag., 1846, Pt. 2, 503–505:

"We conclude with offering these volumes as a desideratum which should be in the hand of every Welshman and in the library of every antiquary interested in the history of the Ancient Britons."—505.

And see 1848, Pt. 2, 92–95, for a biographical notice of the author. Sir Samuel assisted the Rev. T. D. Fosbrooke in his Encyclopædia of Antiquities, 1823–25, (see p. 619 of this Dictionary;) in 1836, contributed the descriptions in Henry Shaw's Specimens of Ancient Furniture; and was the author of many papers in Archæologia, Lon. Gent. Mag., 1822–39, The Analyst, The Cambrian Quarterly Magazine, and The Cambrian Archæological Journal. In 1812, he made some preparations for a history of the monarchs of Britain prior to 703; but this work was never finished. We presume that some of his materials found their way into No. 2, supra. Sir Samuel was one of the most accurate of antiquaries, and his learned works are of great value to the historical student.

The first stanza of this poem is quoted by Sir Walter Scott (Poetical Works, Abbotsford ed., 1851, 553) as an evidence of the justness of a compliment paid to Mickle on a preceding page, (547,) vide infra. 3. The Lusiad, or The Discovery of India; from the Portuguese of Camoens: Book First, Oxf., 1771, 8vo. This was pub. as a specimen. The translator shut himself up in a farm-house for four years, and then, having completed his translation, pub. it in 1775, 4to; again, 1778, 4to; also in 1798, 2 vols. 8vo. He was not invulnerable to criticism:

"Though my work is well received at Oxford," he writes to a friend, "I will honestly own to you some things have hurt me. A few grammatical slips in the introduction have been mentioned; and some things in the notes about Virgil, Milton, and Homer have been called the arrogance of criticism. But the greatest offence of all is what I say of blank verse." See Disraeli's Miscell. of Lit., ed. 1840, 138, 139; Lon. Quar. Rev., xviii. 29.

"Mickle translated the Lusiad in a free paraphrastic manner, but with the spirit of an original poet."—Pursuits of Literature.

"The Lusiad is best known in England by the translation of Mickle, who has been thought to have done something more than justice to his author, both by the unmeasured eulogies he bestows upon him and by the more substantial service of excelling the original in his unfaithful delineation. The style of Mickle is certainly more poetical, according to our standard, than that of Camoens,—that is, more figurative and emphatic; but it seems to me replenished with common-place phrases, and is wanting in the facility and sweetness of the original, in which it is well known that he has interpolated a great deal without a pretence."—Hallam's Lit. Hist. of Europe, 4th ed., 1854, ii. 108.

"Several specimens of Mickle's infidelity in translation, which exceed all liberties ever taken in this way, are mentioned in the Quarterly Review."—Ibid., (note to above.)

Mr. Hallam refers to Southey's annotations in the Lon. Quar. Rev., xxvii. 29–32. The latter critic observes that Mickle,

"in the execution of his task, treated Camoens with as little ceremony as the French used towards the Italian pictures which they repainted in the Louvre; but with this difference, that the original was not destroyed by the process, and that he undertook nothing more than he was well qualified to perform. Some things he kept out of sight, others he softened, others he elevated and enriched. Wherever he thought any thing could be inserted with advantage, he inserted it."

It is to be remarked, however,—and Southey does Mickle the justice to notice the fact,—that the translator makes no pretence to a literal version:

"Nor let the critic," says Mickle, "if he finds the meaning of Camoens in some instances altered, imagine that he has found a blunder. It was not to gratify the dull few, whose greatest pleasure in reading a translation is to see what the author exactly says,—it was to give a poem that might live in the English language,—which was the ambition of the translator."—Note to the Lusiad. See also Ed. Rev., vi. 43; Lon. Month. Rev., xcvii. 405, cix. 470.

"Macao came into the possession of the Portuguese in 1586, and was for many years the centre of their great Eastern commerce. Their national poet, Camoens, resided here for some time, and composed the greater portion of his noble poem, the Lusiad,— Camoens, of whom Elizabeth Barrett Browning writes so exquisitely.

"'Compelling India's genius sad
From the waves through the Lusiad,
With murmurs of a purple ocean
Indrawn in vibrative emotion
Along the verse.'"

Mickle contributed some of the best ballads to F. Evans's Old Ballads (1777, 2 vols; 2d ed., 1784, 4 vols). Among Mickle's pieces are Cumnor Hall, (which suggested Scott's novel of Kenilworth,) and The Red Cross Knight.

"As Mickle, with a vein of greater facility, united a power of verbal melody which might have been envied by bards of much greater renown, he must be considered as very successful in these efforts, if the ballads be regarded as avowedly modern."—SIR WALTER SCOTT: Poetical Works, Abbotsford ed., 1851, 547 (vide supra).

Among the best of Mickle's pieces is The Mariner's Wife:

"But are ye sure the news is true?
And are ye sure he's weel?"

Mickleburg, Rev. James, has earned the gratitude of the reading-community by his Index of Names (containing the positions of between 20,000 and 30,000 places) to the Maps of the D. U. K. Society. Middleton, Conyers, D.D., 1683–1750, a native of York, educated at, and Fellow (1706) of, Trinity College, Cambridge, about 1722 became Principal Librarian of the Public Library at Cambridge, and towards the close of his life was presented to the living of Hascomb, in Surrey. He was "a man of war from his youth;" and, had his judgment been equal to his learning, he might have obtained a place in the first rank of English letters. Several of his more prominent controversies have already been noticed on preceding pages, (see BENTLEY, RICHARD D.D., pp. 170, 171; HOOKE, NATHANIEL, p. 877, &c.;) and others must be referred to in some of our future articles. The first occasion which elicited Middleton's remarkable powers as a writer was an extraordinary demand made by Dr. Bentley of four guineas, in addition to the usual fee of one broad piece, for performing the ceremony of creation when the former was made Doctor of Divinity. After a vigorous remonstrance against this exaction, Middleton and the other divines upon whom the same tax was levied paid the fee upon condition that it should be restored if it should be afterwards decided to be illegal. But, when an award was given in favour of the protestants, Bentley refused to return the money, and Middleton commenced an action against him for his share of the fees thus illegally withheld. This famous controversy has been already sufficiently noticed in our life of RICHARD BENTLEY. In this place, therefore, we need only refer to (1–4) Middleton's four tracts against Bentley, (1719–20,) of the first of which (A Full and Impartial Account of all the late Proceedings in the University o Cambridge against Dr. Bentley) Bishop Monk remarks that it "was the first published specimen of a style which, for elegance, purity, and ease, yields to none in the whole compass of the English language. The acrimonious and resentful feeling which prompted every line is in some measure disguised by the pleasing language, the harmony of the periods, and the vein of scholarship which enliven the whole tract."—Life of Bentley.

Bentley made no secret of his contempt for his adversary; but "Fiddling Conyers," as the former had styled him with reference to his known fondness for musical performances, proved that, when need required, he could handle a pen to as much purpose as a violin.

In 1720 Bentley put forth his Proposals for Printing a New Edition of the Greek Testament, and Middleton assailed his foe with such success in his (5) Remarks upon the Proposals, 1721, 4to, that the enemy was fairly driven from the field. See p. 171 of this Dictionary; Disraeli's Miscell. of Literature; and Quarrels of Authors, ed. 1840, 313. This doughty controversialist had now given to the public a sufficient acquaintance with his powers to insure a lively interest in any thing which might proceed from his pen. His principal publications after 1720 were the following. 6. Bibliotheca Cantabrigiensis Ordinandæ Methodus quædam, Cantab., 1723, 4to. 7. A Letter from Rome, showing an Exact Conformity between Popery and Paganism; or, The Religion of the Present Romans derived from that of their Heathen Ancestors, Lon., 1729, 4to; 1733, 4to; 4th ed., with a Prefatory Discourse and Appendix, 1741, 8vo; new ed., with Addit. Proofs by Publicola, 1812, 8vo; 1813, 8vo. In this reprint there are several alterations and omissions. 8. A Letter to Waterland, containing some Remarks on his Tract entitled Vindication of Scripture; together with the Sketch or Plan of another Answer to Tindal's Book, 1731, anon. Bishop Pearce pub. an answer to this Letter, which elicited (9) A Defence of the Letter to Dr. Waterland against the False and Frivolous Objections of the Author of the Reply, 1731, anon. Pearce replied to this Defence, still treating the author as an infidel; and, that author being now known to be Middleton,—who had already excited doubts of his orthodoxy by his Letter from Rome,—he was in danger of losing his degrees and office of librarian. Promising, however, to publish a satisfactory vindication of his course, the authorities withheld their intended degradation; and in 1732 Middleton gave to the world (10) Some Remarks on Dr. Pearce's Second Reply, &c.; wherein the Author's Sentiments as to all the Principal Points in dispute are fully and clearly Explained in the Manner that had been promised. As in this manifesto the writer strongly asserted his belief in Christianity and disavowed any intention to cast doubt upon its evidences, he saved himself from degradation, but not from strong suspicion of hypocrisy; and this has ever since attached to his name. 11. A Dissertation concerning the Origin of Printing in England; showing that it was first introduced and practised by our Countryman William Caxton, at Westminster, and not, as is commonly believed, by a Foreign Printer at Oxford, Camb., 1735, 4to; reprinted in the 5th vol. of his Miscell. Works, 1755. It was trans. into French by D. G. Imbert, 8vo. See ATKYNS, RICHARD; BOWYER, WILLIAM; CAXTON, WILLIAM; Nichols's Lit. Anec., Index; English bibliographical works, passim. 12. Hist. of the Life of Marcus Tullius Cicero, Lon., 1741, 2 vols. 4to. 13. The Epistles of M. T. Cicero to M. Brutus, and of Brutus to Cicero, with the Latin Text on the opposite page, and English Notes to each Epistle; together with a Prefatory Dissertation, in which the Authority of the said Epistles is Vindicated, and all the Objections of the Rev. Mr. Tunstall particularly Considered and Confuted, 1743. This Prefatory Discourse was elicited by Tunstall's Epistola ad Middleton, 1741, 8vo; and the Discourse provoked Tunstall's Observations on the Epistles between Cicero and M. Brutus, 1744, 8vo. The importance of this controversy has been rather exaggerated by the critic next to to be quoted:

"The authenticity of the Correspondence between Cicero and Brutus has formed the subject of a literary controversy perhaps the most celebrated which has ever occurred, except that concerning the Epistles of Phalaris. Tunstall denied their genuineness in his Epistola ad Middleton, who answered with considerable and unprovoked asperity, which produced Tunstall's Observations."

See Dunlop's Hist. of Roman Lit.

We have now to consider the merits and demerits of the work by which the name of Conyers Middleton will always be best known to the general reader,—The Life of Cicero. The author remarks, with much truth,

"As to the nature of my work, though the title of it carries nothing more than The History of Cicero's Life, yet it might properly enough be called The History of Cicero's Times."—Original Preface.

The edition of Cicero's Life which the reader must procure is that pub. by H. G. Bohn, Lon., 1848, imp. 8vo, which includes Cicero's Letters to several of his Friends, by Melmoth, (see Melmoth, William,) and Letters to Atticus, by Heberden. In the words of an enthusiastic critic,

"This book is a library, the whole Corpus of Tully. What a fund of genius, what eloquence, what feeling, is contained in these eight hundred pages!"—Lon. Lit. Gazette.

This animated laudation may remind the reader of the calmer but equally eulogistic language of the great historian of Rome:

"After finishing this great author and library of eloquence and reason, I read and applauded the observation of Quintilian,—that every student may judge of his own proficiency by the satisfaction which he receives from Cicero."—Gibbon.

The only deficiency of which we are aware in the volume just recommended—and a grave fault it is in any book—is the want of a General Index: see Ayscough, Saml. To this volume the reader must not fail to add Cicero's Treatise on the Commonwealth and Laws, translated, with Dissertations, Illustrations, and Notes from other Authors, Divine, Canonical, Civil, &c., by Barham, 1842, 2 vols. 8vo. But to our promised consideration of the merits and demerits of Middleton's Life of Cicero,—to which, by-the-way, there were no less than 3000 subscribers, whose united payments enabled the rejoicing author to retire to a pleasant farm at Hildersham, where he carried on his literary researches without interruption:

"Wolfius, in his edition of the Four Controversial Orations of Cicero, Berlin, 1801, (see Gent. Mag., vol. lxxi. p. 913,) observes that his Life by Middleton, with all its high praises, has three great faults: first, that the hero is frequently set off beyond the bounds of truth; secondly, that he is represented more as a political than a literary character; and, thirdly, that too little critical attention is paid to the historical facts."—Rich. Gough: Nichols's Lit. Anec., v. 413, 414, q. v. for some other opinions on this work, brief extracts from which we present:

"The style of Middleton, which is commonly esteemed very pure, is blemished with many vulgar and cant terms; such as, Pompey had a month's mind, &c. He has not been successful in the translations of those many epistles of Tully which he has inserted, which, however curious, yet break the thread of the narration. Mongault and Melmoth have far exceeded him in their excellent translations of these pieces; which are, after all, some of the most precious remains of antiquity. . . . It is a pleasing and useful work, especially to younger readers, as it gives a comprehensive view of a most interesting period in the Roman history, and of the characters principally concerned in those important events."—Dr. Warton's Essay on Pope, ii. 324.

See the charge (Nichols's Lit. Anec., v. 414–417) which Warton and Parr bring against Middleton of borrowing largely from Bellendenus. Dr. Knox says of Cicero's Epistles,

"They are thought not to appear to the best advantage in the specimens which Dr. Middleton has inserted in his Life of Cicero. No one was better able to do them justice than that great biographer; but it is said he committed the task of translation to some inferior writer."—Knox's Essays, ii. 56.

"Lord Bolingbroke used to tell his friends that he could never get through the doctor's 'Life of Cicero.' This was, perhaps, owing to his inserting so many quotations from Tully's writings, the translations of which were furnished him (as he told Dr. Lancaster) by his patron, Lord Harvey, and could not, perhaps, be refused."—Seward's Anecdotes, ii. 344.

"Middleton, in his Life of Cicero, though a man of classical taste and an historian of a classical era, could not preserve himself from colloquial inelegancies: the greatest characters are levelled by the poverty of his style."—Disraeli's Miscell. of Lit.: Style: ed. 1840, 8vo.

"The style of Middleton is considered to be as pure English as can be read; and whether Hume did, or did not, form his own style upon that of this author, it is certain that Mr. Fox (no mean arbiter in literary taste) always spoke warmly of the biography of Cicero by Middleton, for its style as well as its matter. . . . There was scarcely a family of distinction at the time [of its publication] but what possessed a copy of Middleton's Cicero."—Dibdin's Lib. Comp., 1825, 531.

"Middleton and Blackstone are the two best, in their way, of the writers of their period. . . . There are many fine passages in Middleton's Life of Cicero."—Sir James Mackintosh: Conversations with Alexander H. Everett; N. Amer. Rev., xxxv. 446.

"Middleton's Life of Cicero may be considered as a most important branch of Roman history. It is an admirable work. The life of that great man spreads over the whole interesting period of the dying convulsions of the Republic. . . . The eventful life of Cicero, his splendid public services, his exalted patriotism, his surprising industry, his immense erudition, his profound sagacity, his incorruptible integrity, his almost Christian philosophy, are thoroughly apparent in his works, and elegantly delineated in Middleton's life of him."—Chancellor Kent: Course of English Reading, Oakley's ed., 1853.

But it is not seriously to be doubted that Wolfius's objections to the indiscriminating panegyric of the biographer were well founded. In the words of an accomplished critic of our own day,

"Actions for which Cicero himself—the most eloquent and skilful of advocates—could contrive no excuse, actions which in his confidential correspondence he mentioned with remorse and shame, are represented by his biographer as wise, virtuous, heroic."—Lord Macaulay: Lord Bacon: Crit. and Hist. Essays, 1854, ii. 132: from Edin. Rev., July, 1837.

Lord Macaulay goes so far as to assert that "The whole history of that great revolution which overthrew the Roman aristocracy, the whole state of parties, the character of every public man, is elaborately misrepresented, in order to make out something which may look like a defence of one most eloquent and accomplished trimmer."—Ibid., q. v.

"Dr. Middleton was the acute and malignant adversary of all claims to miraculous powers in the primitive church."—Lon. Quar. Review.

"It would be difficult to add any thing to this writer upon the subject."—Edin. Rev.

"Middleton's Free Inquiry is an instance of great prudence and moderation in drawing conclusions respecting particular facts from general principles. The premises would have carried him much further than he has gone."—Sir James Mackintosh: Conversations with Alexander H. Everett: N. Amer. Rev., xxxv. 446.

The Introductory Discourse to this work, and the Free Inquiry itself, elicited numerous controversial tracts. Middleton was attacked by Stebbing, Chapman, Parker, Brooke, Jackson, Church, &c., and was defended by Yates, Jenkin, Toll, &c. A list of the principal publications on the subject are enumerated by Kippis in a note to the 6th Part of Doddridge's Course of Lectures. See also Orme's Bibl. Bib.; Lowndes's Bibl. Man., 981; Bickersteth's C. S., 298; W. Strong's Cat. of English Theology, 1830, Pt. 2, Nos. 9441, 9442; Lord Jeffrey's Contrib. to Edin. Rev., 1853, 890; Lord Brougham's Men of Letters of the Time of George III., 1855, 384. Middleton pub., in 1748, (18,) Some Remarks on two Pamphlets (by Drs. Stebbing and Chapman) published against the Introduction; and, in the year after his death, appeared (19) Vindication of the Free Inquiry into the Miraculous Powers, &c. from the Objections of Dr. Dodwell and Dr. Church, 1751, 4to.

"The discourse," remarks Mr. Orme, referring to the whole controversy, "is worthy of attention; for, though the combatants on both sides carried matters too far, considerable information may be collected from them,—on the character and testimony of the Fathers, the nature of miracles and of the evidence which is necessary to authenticate them, and on other points closely connected with the Christian revelation."—Bibl. Bib.

It was declared by Middleton's opponents that the tendency of his Inquiry was to weaken, or indeed destroy, the evidence of miraculous interpositions; but Middleton explicitly disavowed such intentions, and should have the benefit of the doubt. But, if we were disposed to allow his rigid orthodoxy,—and this would be a large demand upon the charity of a theological critic,—it is impossible to deny his passion for controversy. He seems never to have been so much pleased as when, by broaching some startling point of disputation, he succeeded in horrifying the minds of his more orthodox brethren. Accordingly, before the theological world had recovered from the surprise and indignation into which they had been thrown by the Free Inquiry, its fearless author put forth to the world an attack upon Bishop Sherlock, entitled An Examination of the Lord-Bishop of London's Discourses concerning the Use and Intent of Prophecy, &c., 1750. In this work he attempted to refute Sherlock's theory of a chain of prophecy running through the different portions of the Old Testament:

"Dr. Middleton, in his Examination, has thought fit to treat both the argument and its author with great contempt and scurrility, but with little force of reasoning. He was ably answered by Dr. Rutherford, Laurence Jackson, Rotheram, and others."—BISHOP VAN MILDERT.

Had Middleton's term of years been extended to a patriarchal longevity, we presume that he would have continually found fresh delight in fresh disputations; but the time had now arrived for his encounter with a foe who is proverbial for having every thing his own way, who never condescends to argue, and with whom remonstrance is of no avail. But he died, as we have seen, with the armour on his back and the lance in his hand. His Miscellaneous Tracts, never before published, to which are added some scarce Pieces of the same author that were printed in his lifetime, were pub. in 1752, 4to. In the same year there appeared his Miscellaneous Works, containing all his writings excepting the Life of Cicero, 4 vols. 4to; 2d ed., 1755, 5 vols. 8vo. Contents: Inquiry on Miraculous Powers in the Church; Letters to Warburton, Venn, &c.; Remarks on two Pamphlets; Vindication of his Inquiry; On the Dissension between Peter and Paul at Antioch; On the Variations of the Evangelists; On St. John and Cerinthus; Defence of Waterland; Remarks on Bentley's Proposals; Treatise on the Roman Senate; Letter from Rome; Examination of Sherlock on Prophecy; Dissertation on the Origin of Printing in England; Latin Orations, &c. "Dr. Middleton was a man of no common attainments: his learning was elegant and profound, his judgment was acute and polished, his taste was fine and correct: his style was so pure and harmonious, so vigorously flowing without being inflated, that, Addison alone excepted, he seems to me without a rival."—Parr's Preface to Bellendenus.

Middleton, Thomas, d. about 1626? a dramatic author of whom but little more is known than that he was appointed Chronologer to the City of London a short time before his death, besides writing many plays and several pageants himself, assisted Rowley in The Changeling, The Spanish Gipsy, and The Fair Quarrel, Rowley and Massinger in The Old Law, Fletcher and Johnson in the composition of The Widow, and had a hand in some of the other partnership-productions for which his age was so famous. His pieces date from 1602 to '26. A complete collection of his productions was first pub. by the Rev. Alexander Dyce, with Life of the Author, Lon., 1840, 5 vols. p. 8vo. "Mr. Dyce's excellent edition."—Edin. Rev.

"Our very high opinion of the diligence, skill, and judgment of Rev. A. Dyce, whose editions leave little to desire, less to improve."—Lon. Quar. Rev.

Among the best-known of Middleton's plays are A Mad World, my Masters, and The Roaring Girl, (in this he was assisted by Decker;) but nothing has tended so much to preserve him from oblivion as the similarity between parts of his play of The Witch, a Tragi-Comedy, and the witch-scenes in Macbeth. In the consideration of the question how far the indebtedness of Shakspeare to Middleton herein can be fairly traced, perhaps the priority of The Witch has been too easily admitted. As this play was never printed before the year 1778, when Isaac Reed had 104 copies struck off for private distribution, it would be very difficult to prove that Middleton had not borrowed from Macbeth,—especially as we have evidence, as just asserted, that the author of The Witch continued to use his dramatic pen until the year of his death. That one borrowed from the other is not for a moment to be questioned; and how closely, a comparison between the witch-scene in Macbeth and the following extract from Middleton's Witch will show the curious reader:

"(The Witches going about the cauldron,)
Black spirits, and white; red spirits, and grey;
Mingle, mingle, mingle, you that mingle may.
Titty, Tiffin, keep it stiff in;
Firedrake, Puckey, make it lucky;
Liard, Robin, you must bob in.
Round, around, around, about, about;
All ill come running in; all good keep out!"

Yet is there a vast difference between the witches of Middleton and those of Shakspeare; and this difference has been well expressed by Charles Lamb:

"Though some resemblance may be traced between the charms in Macbeth and the incantations in this play, which is supposed to have preceded it, this coincidence will not detract much from the originality of Shakspeare. His witches are distinguished from the witches of Middleton by essential differences. These are creatures to whom man or woman, plotting some dire mischief, might resort for occasional consultation. Those originate deeds of blood, and begin bad impulses to men. From the moment that their eyes first meet with Macbeth's, he is spell-bound. That meeting sways his destiny. He can never break the fascination. These witches can hurt the body, those have power over the soul. Hecate, in Middleton, has a son, a low buffoon: the hags of Shakspeare have neither child of their own, nor seem to be descended from any parent. They are foul anomalies, of whom we know not whence they are sprung, nor whether they have beginning or ending. As they are without human passions, so they seem to be without human relations. They come with thunder and lightning, and vanish to airy music. This is all we know of them. Except Hecate, they have no names,—which heightens their mysteriousness. The names and some of the properties which the other author has given to his hags excite smiles. The Weird Sisters are serious things. Their presence cannot coexist with mirth. But, in a lesser degree, the witches of Middleton are fine creations. Their power, too, is in some measure over the mind. They raise jars, jealousies, strifes, 'like a thick scurf' over life."—Charac. of Dramat. Writers.

After showing the inferiority of Middleton's witches, Dr. Drake concludes with the admission that "The hags of Middleton are, however, drawn with a bold and creative pencil, and seem to take a middle station between the terrific sisterhood of Shakspeare, and the traditionary witch of the country-village. They are pictures full of fancy, but not kept sufficiently aloof from the ludicrous and familiar."—Ibid., 566.

As regards Middleton's characteristics as a dramatic poet, the same eminent critic remarks,

"Humour, wit, and character, though in a degree inferior to that which distinguishes the preceding poets, [see the text,] are to be found in the comedy of Middleton, and occasionally a pleasing interchange of elegant imagery and tender sentiment. His tragedy is not devoid of pathos, though possessing little dignity or elevation; but there is in many of his plays, and especially in the tragi-comedy of The Witch, a strength and compass of imagination which entitles him to a very respectable rank among the cultivators of the romantic drama."—Ibid., 565–566.

"Middleton's style," remarks Mr. Hazlitt, "was not marked by any peculiar quality of his own, but was made up, in equal proportions, of the faults and excellences common to his contemporaries. In his 'Women beware Women' there is a rich marrowy vein of internal sentiment, with fine occasional insight into human nature and cool cutting irony of expression. He is lamentably deficient in the plot and denouement of the story."—Lects. on the Age of Elizabeth, Lect. II.

After a brief survey of the characteristics of a number of the minor "dramatists under the first Stuarts," the accomplished historian of The Literature of Europe remarks,

"Middleton belongs to this lower class of dramatic writers: his tragedy entitled 'Women beware Women' is founded on the story of Bianca Capella; it is full of action, but the characters are all too vicious to be interesting, and the language does not rise much above mediocrity. In comedy Middleton deserves more praise. 'A Trick to Catch the Old One,' and several others that bear his name, are amusing and spirited. But Middleton wrote chiefly in conjunction with others, and sometimes with Jonson and Massinger."—Hallam's Lit. Hist. of Europe, 4th ed., 1854, iii. 124.

Middleton, Thomas Fanshawe, D.D., 1769-1822, a native of Kedleston, Derbyshire, admitted into Christ's Hospital, 1779; graduated B.A. at Pembroke Hall, Cambridge, 1792; Curate of Gainsborough, Lincolnshire, 1793; Rector of Tansor, Northamptonshire, 1795; Curate of St. Peter's Mancroft, Norwich, 1799; Rector of Bytham, Lincolnshire, 1802; graduated D.D. at Cambridge, 1808; Prebendary of Lincoln, 1809; Archdeacon of Huntingdon, 1812; Vicar of St. Pancras, Middlesex, and Rector of Rottenham, Hertfordshire, 1811; consecrated the first Bishop of Calcutta, May 8, 1814, and arrived at Calcutta Nov. 28 of the same year; laboured with great zeal in his episcopal office for about eight years, and died of a fever at Calcutta, July 8, 1822. In addition to his great work on the Greek Article, Dr. Middleton pub. a number of Sermons, Charges, Addresses, &c., which were collected into one vol., with a Life of the Author prefixed, by Henry Kaye Bonney, D.D., Archdeacon of Bedford, Lon., 1824, 8vo.

"Amongst the eminent and talented men who have ornamented the English Church in the present age, we are persuaded that the late Bishop of Calcutta will hold a very distinguished rank in our ecclesiastical records. His Sermons and Charges are all distinguished by that energetic and masculine style of thought and language which ever accompanied the conception of this excellent prelate."—Lon. Chris. Rememb.

A Life of Bishop Middleton, by the Rev. Charles Webb Le Bas, was pub. in 1830, 2 vols. 8vo. See Blackw. Mag., 141. Whilst curate of Gainsborough, Mr. Middleton edited the Country Spectator, to which he contributed most of the papers; and for some time he discharged the editorial duties connected with the British Critic. His Doctrine of the Greek Article applied to the Criticism and Illustration of the New Testament was written about 1802, and first pub. in 1808, 8vo. A second ed., revised by the Rev. James Scholefield, (Regius Professor of Greek in the University of Cambridge,) was issued in 1828, 8vo; and a third ed., with [valuable] Prefatory Observations and Notes by the Rev. Hugh James Rose, appeared in 1833, 8vo. A fourth ed. was pub. in 1841, 8vo, and a fifth in 1855, 8vo. An Abstract of the Doctrine of the Greek Article, chiefly taken from Middleton's work, is prefixed to vol. i. of Valpy's ed. of the Greek Testament with English Notes, 1831.

"This is a book of profound learning and most masterly criticism. The first part of it is occupied with an inquiry into the nature and uses of the Greek article, and the second contains the application of the views previously established to the interpretation of many passages in the New Testament. The extensive philological attainments of the learned writer are made most happily to bear on a number of difficult texts, and especially on some in which the doctrine of the divinity of Christ is contained. This path of criticism was first opened by the excellent Granville Sharp; but no one has prosecuted it with so much ability and industry as Dr. Middleton. The Eclectic reviewer of this work thus concludes a very able article: 'We regard Dr. Middleton's second part as a more original and a more serviceable accession to the treasures of biblical philology than the confessedly meritorious labours of Bos, Elsner, and Raphelius.'"—Orme's Bibl. Bib., 1824, 318.

"The value of Bishop Middleton's treatise has been too long and too well known to require any additional testimony to its merits in this place. The opposers of the doctrine of our Saviour's supreme divinity cavilled at, but could not fairly refute, the convincing philological proofs accumulated by Bp. M."—Horne's Bibl. Bib., 1839, 210. "For logical precision, correctness of remark, and depth of research, this ranks among the highest class of critical comments. No biblical student should be without it."—Hales's Chronology.

"The only great work on the Greek article."—H. J. Rose.

"The theory was not proposed by its highly-gifted framer without that severe and impartial scrutiny for which his deep critical acumen and thoughtful turn of mind rendered him peculiarly qualified; and, though it has been frequently disputed, no definite objections have been urged against it as a whole, nor are the violations of its rules either so numerous or important as to invalidate in the slightest degree the soundness of the hypothesis."—W. Trollope's Greek Grammar to the New Testament.

"In now taking leave of Dr. Middleton, we have merely to repeat the high approbation which we have already strongly expressed of his very elaborate production," &c.—Lon. Quar. Rev., ii. 187–203.

From this critique Dr. Johnson, in his Life of Dryden, gives long extracts:

"His outrages," remarks the doctor, "seem to be the ebullitions of a mind agitated by stronger resentment than bad poetry can excite, and previously resolved not to be pleased. . . . Such were the strictures of Milbourne, who found few abettors, and of whom it may be reasonably imagined that many who favoured his design were ashamed of his insolence."—Lives of the Poets, Cunningham's ed., 1854, i. 371–374.

Pope impales Milbourne in the Dunciad; but he admits that he is the fairest of critics, as he subjoins his own version of certain parts, that they might be compared with that which he censures. Of Milbourne's theological works the most important is his Legacy to the Church of England, vindicating her Orders from the Objections of Papists and Dissenters; new ed., 1726, 2 vols. 8vo. Mill, Rev. J. Things after Death, Lon., 1854, fp.

Mill, James, 1773–1836, a native of Montrose, educated at the University of Edinburgh, was licensed to preach in 1798; but, changing his views, he became tutor in the family of Sir John Stuart, accompanied this gentleman to London in 1800, and became a frequent contributor to periodical literature. Among the journals which profited by his powerful and rapid pen were The Literary Journal, (edited by Mr. Mills;) The Philanthropist, (a Quaker journal;) The Edinburgh Review, (on Education, Jurisprudence, &c.;) Westminster Review, (especially see paper in No. XI. on the Formation of Opinions, and the one in No. XXV. on The Ballot;) British Review; Eclectic Review; Monthly Review; and London Review. He also contributed a number of articles to the Supplement to the 4th, 5th, and 6th edits. of the Encyclopædia Britannica, which we shall more particularly notice hereafter. After the publication of Mr. Mill's excellent History of India, he was (in 1819) appointed by the East India Court of Directors to the second situation in the Examiners' Office; and on the retirement of Mr. William McCulloch, about 1831, he became Chief Examiner of the Indian Correspondence. His intimate knowledge of the subjects confided to his discretion enabled him to fulfil the duties of his important post (until disabled by sickness for above a year and a half before his death) without withdrawing from the literary fraternity of which he had become so distinguished a member. His publications in book-form were as follows: 1. An Examination of E. F. Jones's System of Book-Keeping, 1796, 8vo. 2. Essay on the Impolicy of a Bounty on the Exportation of Corn, &c., Lon., 1804, 8vo. See McCulloch's Lit. of Polit. Econ., 1845, 75. 3. Essay on the Reformation of Luther; trans. from the French of Villars, with Notes, 1805, 8vo. 4. Commerce Defended, 1807, '08, 8vo. This is an answer to the opinions of Spence, Cobbett, and others. See McCulloch's Lit. of Polit. Econ., 36, 56. 5. The History of British India, 1818, 3 vols. 4to: £6 6*s.*; 2d ed., 1820, 6 vols. 8vo: £4 16*s.*; 3d ed., 6 vols. 8vo: £3 12*s.*; 4th ed., with a Continuation to 1835, and Copious Notes and Illustrations by Horace Hayman Wilson, Esq., M.A., Boden Professor of Sanscrit at Oxford, 1840–48, 9 vols. 8vo: £6 6*s.*; 5th ed., vol. i., Dec. 1857: to be completed in 10 monthly vols. p. 8vo, 6*s.* each. This valuable History was commenced by Mr. Mill as early as 1806, although, as we have seen, not pub. until twelve years later.

"Those parts in which picturesque description and the power of warm and interesting narrative might have been displayed are not made the most of by him. But, in the careful investigation of facts and of the inferences to be drawn from them, in illustrating his subject by help of the widest range of historical knowledge, in discriminating between the real and apparent causes of events, in the examination of policy, in the exposition of the motives of the actors and the consequences of their acts, in unfolding he leaves little to be desired. . . . We cannot speak as favourably of Mr. Mill's style as of his matter. It has many marks of carelessness and some of bad taste, and the narration in a few instances is not free from that greatest of all defects,—obscurity,—which has arisen from an inattention to the use of the tenses of the verbs. In his disquisitions it is vigorous, though not always pure or dignified; and violations of the use of language with respect to particular words are not unfrequently to be met with. But of all these faults our readers will be able to judge from the extracts more severely than we can ourselves, who rise from the reading of the book grateful for the vast body of information which it conveys, and impressed with respect not only for the intellectual qualities of the author but for his high and rare virtues as an historian"—Edin. Rev., xxxi. 1–44, q. v.

'the drift of hollow states hard to be spelled,'

"Mr. Mill's work has been very fairly characterized in the 31st volume of the 'Edinburgh Review.'"—McCulloch's Lit. of Polit Econ., 1845, 107.

Mr. McCulloch quotes some extracts from the article indicated, and adds, with reference to Mr. Mill's status as a political economist,

"He belonged to, and was one of the ablest and most zealous adherents of, the utilitarian school."

We continue our notices of Mr. Mill's History of India:

"We know no writer who takes so much pleasure in the truly useful, noble, and philosophical employment of tracing the progress of sound opinions from their embryo state to their full maturity. He eagerly culls from old despatches and minutes every expression in which he can discern the imperfect germ of any great truth which has since been fully developed. He never fails to bestow praise on those who, though far from coming up to his standard of perfection, yet rise in a small degree above the level of their contemporaries. It is thus that the annals of past times ought to be written. It is thus, especially, that the annals of our own country ought to be written."—LORD MACAULAY: Essays, Lon., 1854, ii. 76, 77; from Edin Rev., July, 1835.

This eminent critic finds himself unable to commend Mr. Mill's style:

"Mr. Mill's book, though it has undoubtedly great and rare merit, is not sufficiently animated and picturesque to attract those who read for amusement."—Essays, ii. 445; from Edin. Rev., Jan. 1840.

Commending the author of The Political History of India for his success in treating the abstruse subjects discussed in his work

"in a manner and within a compass that makes them universally intelligible and attractive,"

the Quarterly reviewer adds that

"Sir John Malcolm's writings possess in these respects a decided superiority over those of Mr. Mill; for, although the latter contain unquestionably much information on every point connected with the history, religion, and general situation of British India and its inhabitants, the whole is presented in a shape and style that tends to discourage rather than to promote the pursuit of the subject by ordinary readers."—Lon. Quar. Rev., xxxv. 32.

Dr. Dibdin, on the contrary, calls Mill's History "a most spirited and popular work," (Lib. Comp., ed. 1825, 426.)

"March 17, 1819.—In the evening looked through the first volume of 'Mill's India.' A rich display of learning; combats all the flattering theories and notices that have been held with respect to the Hindoos; exposes many instances of weakness in Sir W. Jones on this subject."—Tom Moore's Diary, Lon., 1853, ii. 277.

"Mr. Mill, the extent and depth of whose historical researches and boundless industry in arranging and elucidating his materials are beyond all praise."—CAPT. BASIL HALL.

"The labour which has been employed in collecting and examining materials, the skilful distribution of the facts into proper compartments, the high tone of moral feeling and the enlarged philosophy which everywhere pervade the narrative, entitle the 'History of British India' to be regarded as a valuable addition to our national literature. The extensive circulation of Mr. Mill's History will be a benefit both to England and to India."—British Review, No. 24.

"Mill's 'History of British India' is one of those rare works destined to immortality."—Lon. Athen.

Mr. Mill was by no means accused of flattering the governors of the powerful corporation the consideration of the management and influences of which necessarily occupies a large portion of his volumes:

"The only complete and minute history of British India which we yet possess is a laborious philippic. Mr. Mill has carefully exposed every error in the policy of the company and every sort of misconduct in its servants which had ever, before he wrote, been charged against either.

"If Sir John Malcolm should undertake the full subject on the same scale, his history would contain all the arguments and facts which could be urged on the contrary part. He would avow himself the advocate of the system of territorial aggrandizement and the champion of its necessity; for he applauds," &c.—Lon. Month. Rev., cxi. 167.

See MALCOLM, MAJOR-GENERAL SIR JOHN, G.C.B., K.L.S., No. 8.

"Mill's work, as it originally stood, was an elaborate inculpation of the entire policy pursued by the East India Company. He believed that the ruling motives of the body from almost the first hour of its existence were commercial cupidity and a desire of territorial aggrandizement."—Lon. Athen., 1848, 1170, q. v.

"Mr. Mill's History, amongst much valuable information and many just remarks, is disfigured by a constant attempt to underrate the services and conceal the great achievements of the East India Company."—Blackw. Mag., xxxiii. 776–803,—The East India Question, q. v.

See also vol. v. 330–331,—Letters of an Old India Officer,—xvii. 107, xlix. 427; Edin. Rev., lxx. 126; Lon. Month. Rev., xcv. 337, xcvi. 154. Prof. Wilson's new ed. of Mill's History and his Continuation of the narrative met with a welcome reception:

"It is now nearly thirty years since Mr. Mill's 'History of British India'—one of the most remarkable works of the present century—was first published. It remains, and would be likely long to remain, without a competitor, even if it were not to appear with the numerous corrections and illustrated notes and a continuation by the celebrated Oriental scholar, Professor H. H. Wilson."—Westminster Review.

"With all its merits, therefore, something was wanting before Mill's History of British India could take rank as a standard national work. The deficiencies have now been amply supplied: indeed, no living man could be found better able to correct Mr. Mill's errors and modify his too sweeping conclusions than Professor H. H. Wilson, a distinguished Oriental scholar, long a resident in India and familiar with the habits and manners of its diversified inhabitants."—Athenæum.

"There is scarcely, perhaps, another man in England so well qualified to undertake a new edition of this great work as the Boden Professor of Sanscrit at Oxford. Mr. Wilson brings to the labour an intimate knowledge of the literature and history of the East, and has already rendered important services to his country by his learned labours. In editing a new edition of Mill's History of India, there is much to be done which Mr. Wilson is well able to do, and which, as far as these volumes enable us to judge, he will do with the best effect, in correcting the numerous errors of opinion as well as fact which are scattered through that great work. Mr. Wilson's notes are full and to the purpose; and, upon the whole, this work, thus edited, is likely to form an era in the historical literature of the age."—Lon. Atlas.

See also Lon. Athen., 1848, 1170, where Prof. Wilson's "abstinence from deductions" is complained of as a "defect felt throughout his three volumes," (the Continuation.)

"The work is limited to a formal enunciation of abstract principles."—Blackw. Mag., lxiv. 411.

"This work is a résume of the doctrines of Smith and of Ricardo with respect to the production and distribution of wealth, and of those of Malthus with respect to population. But it is of too abstract a character to be either popular or of much utility. . . . The science is very far from having arrived at the perfection Mr. Mill supposed."—McCulloch's Lit. of Polit. Econ., 1845, 17–18.

Essays on Government, Jurisprudence, Liberty of the Press, Prison and Prison-Discipline, Colonies, Law of Nations, and Education, 8vo; reprinted from the Supplement to the Encyclopædia Britannica in 1828; for private distribution only. This volume was reviewed by Mr. (now Lord) Macaulay in the Edin. Review for March, 1829; Jeremy Bentham replied to the reviewer in the Westminster Review, No. XXI., Art. 16; Mr. Macaulay returned to the charge and answered Mr. Bentham in the Edinburgh Review for June, 1829; the Westminster Review replied to this article in No. XXII., Art. 16; Mr. Macaulay again took up the cudgels in the Edinburgh Review for Oct. 1829. These articles have been reprinted in the American editions of Lord Macaulay's Essays, (see our article on LORD MACAULAY in this Dictionary;) but as the author, from motives highly honourable to himself, (see the Preface to the London editions of his Essays,) has not thought proper to sanction their republication in England, we do not feel ourselves at liberty to give any quotations from them in this place. The first of the Essays in Mr. Mill's volume—that On Government—and the one On Education were noticed by Sir James Mackintosh in his Preliminary Dissertation to the Encyclopædia Britannica, (7th ed., vol. i. 384.) See also Tom Moore's Memoirs, 1853, iv. 255. 8. Analysis of the Phenomena of the Human Mind, 1829, 2 vols. 8vo. Perhaps it would not be incorrect to call this work an exposition of the doctrines, or, rather, doctrine, of Hartley. See Prelim. Dissert. to Encyc. Brit., 7th ed., vol. i. 380, (by Sir James Mackintosh;) Westm. Rev., xiii. 265; Blackw. Mag., xlvi. 671. 9. Fragment on Mackintosh, 1835, anon. See MACKINTOSH, SIR JAMES, p. 1181 of this Dictionary. Mr. Mill was not at all pleased with the unceremonious manner in which his favourite Hobbes was handled by Sir James. Mr. Lewes, in some observations upon the philosophy of Hobbes, remarks,

"The first person who saw his importance as a political thinker and had the courage to proclaim it was, we believe, James Mill."—Biographical Hist. of Philos., 2d ed., 1857.

We have already noticed Mr. Mill's championship of the doctrines of Thomas Hobbes,—see p. 855 of this Dictionary,—where, by-the-way, it will be seen that, if Messieurs Hobbes and Mill are right, there are more great names justly liable to the charge of error than those of Mackintosh and Macaulay. How far Mr. Mill has made good his censures of Mackintosh's Dissertation, on general grounds, it must be left to the reader to decide.

Mill, Job. Practice of Conveyancing, 1745, fol.

Mill, John. Praxis Criminalis, Figuris Ligneis Illustrata, Paris, 1541, fol. A curious tract.

Mill, John, D.D., 1645–1707, a native of Shap, Westmoreland, entered as servitor of Queen's College, 1661; Rector of Blechingdon, Oxfordshire, 1681; Principal of St. Edmund's Hall, 1685; Prob. of Canterbury, 1704. Mill is famous for having devoted the labour of thirty years to the preparation of a new edition of the Greek Testament, and finished it only fourteen days before his death: Ἡ ΚΑΙΝΗ ΔΙΑΘΗΚΗ. Novum Testamentum Græcum, cum Lectionibus Variantibus MSS. Exemplarum, Versionum, Editionum SS. Patrum et Scriptorum Ecclesiasticorum, et in easdem notis: Studio et labore Joannis Millii, S. T. P. Oxonii, e Theatre Sheldoniano, 1707, fol. The "various readings" are reckoned about 30,000. The text is that of Robert Stephens's edit., 1550. Dr. Whitby attacked the work in his Examen Variantum Lectionum Johannis Millii, 1710, (afterwards annexed to Whitby's Commentary on the New Testament;) but Michaelis, Marsh, Harwood, and critical scholars generally attest the just value of Mill's edition. Indeed, Whitby's objections to the work were based upon the fear that the authenticity of the text would be deemed doubtful if so many readings were allowed to be matters of criticism; and Anthony Collins, in his Discourse upon Free-Thinking, quotes a passage of Whitby's to this effect, as a confirmation of his arguments against the New Testament. But the great Bentley, under the signature of Phileleutherus Lipsiensis, rebuked Collins in a manner long to be remembered,—as we have already shown in our lives of RICHARD BENTLEY, D.D., and ANTHONY COLLINS, pp. 171, 412 of this Dictionary. Dr. John Gregory (see our life of JOHN FELL, D.D., p. 584 of this Dictionary) raises the same objection which Whitby urges. Michaelis remarks that

"the infancy of criticism ends with the edition of Gregory, and the age of manhood commences with that of Mill."

Mill's edition ranks next to that of Wetstein in importance and utility. The prolegomena are beyond price:

"Notwithstanding those of Wetstein, they still retain their original value, for they contain a great deal of matter which is not in Wetstein; and of the matter which is common to both, some things are more clearly explained by Mill."—MICHAELIS. See Horne's Bibl. Bib., 1839, 16.

"The prolegomena and notes are very valuable; but he leaves, in general, to future critics the application of the materials which he provided for the amendment of the text."—Orme's Bibl. Bib., q. v. for a notice of the principal objections (easily refuted) urged against Mill's version.

It will be remembered (see BENTLEY, RICHARD, p. 170 of this Dictionary) that it was by Epistola ad Clarum virum Joannem Millium, appended to the Oxford edition of Joannes Malelas Antiochenus, 1691, that Bentley first made his name known throughout Europe as a learned critic. Mill is sometimes called the editor of Malelas's Chronicle; but it seems to have been only published under his superintendence,—Chilmead, who supervised the proofs, dying before the work was issued. Mill, John Stuart, b. 1806, son of James Mill, the author of The History of India, (ante,) was educated at home under the eye of his father, became a clerk in the India House in 1823, and in 1856 attained the important position so ably filled by his father from 1831 to '36,—Chief Examiner of India Correspondence. From 1835 to '40, a portion of the time in conjunction with Sir William Molesworth, he was editor of the Westminster Review, (see Blackw. Mag., xv. 558,) and he has contributed a number of articles to the Edinburgh Review, Westminster Review, and other periodicals. Among the best-known of his fugitive papers are the Account of the State of Philosophy in England pub. in the London Review, and the review of Whately's Logic in the Westminster Review, ix. 137. We have already noticed his edition of his friend Jeremy Bentham's Rationale of Judicial Evidence, 1827, 5 vols. 8vo, (BENTHAM, JEREMY, p. 168 of this Dictionary.) Mr. Mill has given to the world the following volumes: 1. System of Logic Ratiocinative and Inductive; being a connected view of the Principles of Evidence and the Methods of Scientific Investigation, 1843, 2 vols. 8vo, pp. 1204; 2d ed., 1846, 2 vols. 8vo; 3d ed., 1850, 2 vols. 8vo, 1851, 2 vols. 8vo; 4th ed., 1856, 2 vols. 8vo; Amer. ed., N. York, 1846, 8vo.

"Perhaps the greatest contribution to English speculation since Locke's Essay. Had Mr. Mill invented a new terminology and expressed himself with less clearness, he would assuredly have gained that reputation for profundity which, by a thorough misconception of the nature of thought, is so often awarded to obscurity."—Lewes's Biog. Hist. of Mod. Philos., 2d ed., 1857, Introduc. note.

See also Mr. Lewes's remarks at the conclusion of his notice of Descartes.

"One of the greatest steps which have yet been made in the philosophy of Logic—a step which may almost be termed a discovery, when we consider the inveteracy of the habits and prejudices which it has cast to the winds—is that recently taken by Mr. Mill [System of Logic, 2d ed., chap. iii., on the functions and logical value of the Syllogism] in showing that all reasoning (meaning thereby the investigation of truth as distinguished from the mere interpretation of a formula) is from particulars to particulars, and in thence assigning to general propositions their true character, and to the syllogism its true office."—Edin. Rev., xcii. 2.

"Perhaps," remarks the critic, in a note, "Mr. Mill may be considered as only following out more emphatically the views originally taken by Berkeley on this subject, but which seem to have dropped so far out of notice as to give their rival all the force of novelty."

"It is excellent throughout,—in its plan, in its illustrations, examples, and in its execution every way: in a word, it is perfect of its kind. To most young persons composition is the most painful task in the culture of the mind, and so it must be as long as they are required to write out their thoughts before they have been taught to think. Your book provides a remedy for this very defective system: it teaches the pupil how to take the first step in the difficult art of thinking, and then encourages and leads him on until he can do without a guide."—DR. COGSWELL, of New York.

"Those who choose to grapple with this work will find that it presents a new view of the subject; that it is a sort of Novum Organum, adapted to the state of intellectual and physical science at the present day; and that it is treated with a breadth and comprehensiveness of thought, in a style of thorough analysis, and with a surpassingly clear and forcible diction, which entitle it to the faithful study of all who aspire to the merit of philosophica. research or even of general scholarship."—N. Amer. Rev., lxi. 349–383, q. v.

"A production, we predict, which will distinguish the age; which no scholar should be without; but which, above all, should be the manual of every lawyer who is not infamously content with being a mere cantor formularum. If there be any one excellence which particularly distinguishes this work, it is the philosophical dignity, the spirit of liberal candor, that uniformly pervades it. The style is, in our judgment, a model,—in thought as in method clear as crystal, in expression precise as the symbolical language of algebra."—Democratic Review, xv. 441.

"In a special chapter, newly added to the work, he has made an attempt to set in a clearer light the mutual relations of chemistry and physics to physiology and pathology; and here he cannot refrain from acknowledging how great have been his obligations, in reference to this object, to the study of Mr. Mill's System of Logic. Indeed, he feels that he can claim no other merit than that of having applied to some special cases, and carried out further than have been previously done, those principles of research in natural science which have been laid down by that distinguished philosopher."—LIEBIG: Preface to Animal Chemistry.

"This is a treatise which deserves, and will repay, the most attentive study. No one who intelligently examines it can fail to perceive the vigour, clearness, and originality by which it is in great part characterized. Yet we must express our conviction that the clearness and depth which the author has so frequently shown by no means distinguish every portion of his work. . . With all its defects, it is one of the ablest treatises on logic which have yet made their appearance."—Brit. Quar. Rev., iv. 1–38.

"Of very high repute and acknowledged merit as a work on Logic. His sympathies, however, with the infidel philosophy of Comte are as visible as objectionable."—Colwell's Prelim. Essay to List's National System of Polit. Econ., 1856, xix. See also lviii., n.

"Mr. John S. Mill, in his Logic Ratiocinative and Inductive, dragged down logic into the very mire of empiricism. Taking Brown—who, as we have seen, makes consciousness convertible with feeling—as his guide in the philosophy of the mind, he constructed a system of logic in which the higher faculties of the mind are ignored. While Whately, with some show of reason, resolved induction into deduction or syllogism proper, Mill most preposterously resolved all deduction into induction, and thereby consummated the degradation of logic. . . . Mr. Mill stands revealed as a thinker who does not understand himself, but crosses his own path in his exposition of doctrines; and the best refutation is to leave him in the entanglement of his own traditions."—Hist. of Philosophy, by Samuel Tyler: South. Quar. Rev., Nov. 1856, and in pp. 40–42 of pamphlet-reprint.

Mr. Lyall, also, in his Agonistes, or Philosophical Strictures, 1856, finds, or professes to find, (for we represent both parties in these literary controversies,) many errors in Mr. Mill's work: see Agonistes, Lectures XXVIII.–XXXI., pp. 307–380. In this work Mr. Mill discusses five subjects: I. On National Interchange; II. On the Influence of Consumption upon Production; III. On the Words Productive and Unproductive; IV. On Profits and Interest; V. On the Definition of Political Economy, and the Method of Investigation proper to it. A review of the work will be found in the Edinburgh Review, lxxxviii. 293–304. This work is divided into five books, viz.: I. On Production; II. On Distribution; III. On Exchange; IV. On the Influence of the Progress of Society on Production and Distribution; V. On the Influence of Government.

"The present edition has been revised throughout, and several chapters either materially added to or entirely recast. Among these may be mentioned that on the Means of abolishing Cottier Tenantry, the suggestions contained in which had reference exclusively to Ireland, and to Ireland in a condition which has been much modified by subsequent events. An addition has been made to the theory of international values laid down in the eighteenth chapter of the Third Book. The chapter on Property has been almost entirely rewritten. . . . The chapter on the Futurity of the Labouring Classes has been enriched with the results of the experience afforded, since this work was first published, by the co-operative associations in France."—Extracts from Preface of Third Edition, 1852.

It is of course impossible by the quotation of a few lines to convey to the reader any correct idea of the impression which Mr. Mill's treatment of so many important subjects has made upon his critics. The 4th ed. was pub. in 1818, 4 vols. 8vo. It is time now (1857) that a new ed had appeared of a work, not faultless, indeed, but of considerable value to the historical and political student.

"The other instance I came to take [Montesquieu was the first] of men being misled by a love of theory, is that of the late Professor Millar,—a man of very strong understanding, well disciplined by study, and, above all, by legal study, though never by having either practised as a lawyer or borne any share in public affairs. He was, however, in all respects a very different inquirer from the French President, and had a mind of a much more vigorous and manly cast, although he was apt to run riot in speculation, as we shall more fully perceive when we come to examine his 'History of the English Mixed Government.' Miller, Edward, M.D., 1760–1812, a son of the Rev. John Miller, of Dover, Delaware, and a brother of the Rev. Samuel Miller, D.D., late Professor in the Theological Seminary at Princeton, New Jersey, was a native of Dover; became a surgeon in the United States Army in 1780; practised for some time at Frederica, Delaware, and subsequently in Maryland; resided at Dover from 1786 to '96, and for the remainder of his life lived in the city of New York. In 1803, he was appointed Resident Physician for the city of New York; in 1807, he was elected Professor of the Practice of Physic in the University of New York; in 1809, he became one of the physicians of the New York Hospital, and soon afterwards received the appointment of Clinical Lecturer of that institution. His Medical Works,—which are of great value,—preceded by a Biographical Sketch by his brother, the Rev. Dr. Samuel Miller, were pub. in 1814, 8vo. Another biographical notice of Dr. Miller (written by John W. Francis, M.D., of New York) will be found in the American Medical and Philosophical Register. Dr. Miller assisted his brother Samuel in the preparation of his Brief Retrospect of the Eighteenth Century. The greater part of Dr. Miller's contributions to the literature of his profession were originally pub. in the Medical Repository, the first journal of the kind in the United States. It was established by Drs. Miller, Samuel L. Mitchill, and Elihu N. Smith, in August, 1797; and Dr. Miller lived to see the publication of the 14th vol. and the preparation of a large portion of the 15th.

"In the records of illustrious men who have promoted and adorned the science of our country, Dr. Miller will always maintain a distinguished rank."—Dr. Benj. Rush.

Miller, George, D.D., 1764–1848, a native of Dublin, educated at and Fellow of Trinity College in his native city, became Vicar-General of Armagh, and Lecturer of Modern History in his Alma Mater. He pub. papers on intellectual and natural philosophy in Trans. Irish Acad. 1793, and Nic. Jour. 1801; A Letter to Dr. Pusey in reference to his Letter to the Lord-Bishop of Oxford, 1840, 8vo; a Second Letter to Dr. Pusey, 1841, 8vo; and the following work, which enjoys a high reputation: Lects. on the Philosophy of Modern History from the Fall of the Roman Empire to the French Revolution, Dubl., 1816–28, 8 vols. 8vo; 2d ed., with author's latest improvements, 1832, 4 vols. 8vo; 3d ed., 1849, 4 vols. p. 8vo; (Bohn's Standard Lib.,) 1852, 4 vols. 8vo. With Memoir of the Author.

"Dr. Miller assumes, as the basis of his system, that all the events of this world have an intrinsic connexion, which gives them the coherence and the unity of a moral drama. A single event or period, taken by itself, is as a grain of dust in this mighty balance. . . . Human history being thus a drama of the Divine Providence, all its parts are, with a strict unity of action, supposed to be made subordinate and conducive to the result."—Edin. Rev., l. 287–344, q. v.

This reviewer does not appear to consider that Dr. Miller has made out his case. Other critics speak more favourably of the work:

"Dr. Miller advances and establishes his great principle, that God reigneth in the affairs of men, and that the end of the divine government is man's improvement."—Dubl. Univ. Mag., xiii. 571–579.

"His work possesses a unity of subject, harmony of proportion, and connexion of parts that render it not merely the best modern history in our language, but the only one from which a student can obtain a systematic view of the progress of civilisation. Another merit of Dr. Miller's work is, that it necessarily leads to the consideration of the important historical problem to which we have more than once referred,—the operation of opinion upon action."—Foreign Quar. Rev.

"What Montesquieu accomplished for the laws of Europe, Dr. Miller has done for its history. We know of no text-book which would be more essential to the college-lecturer, no general view of facts which is likely to be more valuable to the student, and no elucidation of the mysterious ways of Providence which ought to be more gladly welcomed by the Christian."—*Lon. "It presents, besides the matured experience of the author, the most recent views and investigations of modern obstetric writers, such as Dubois, Cazeaux, Simpson, W. Tyler Smith, &c.; thus embodying the results not only of the American, but also of the Paris, the London, and the Edinburgh obstetric schools. The author's position for so many years as a teacher of his favourite branch has given him a familiarity with the wants of students, and a facility of conveying instruction, which cannot fail to render the volume eminently adapted to its purposes."—Advertisement.

Miller, Hugh, 1802–1856, a native of Cromarty, Scotland, laboured for about fifteen years as a quarryman, and subsequently filled for six years the situation of accountant in a bank in his native village. Although deprived of the opportunities of early education, he evinced a great fondness for reading, and from time to time contributed articles to the Inverness Courier and other periodicals, and even ventured to publish a small volume of poetry, now forgotten, and a volume of prose sketches, (see No. 2,) likely to be remembered. When the great question of the disruption of the Church of Scotland agitated the minds of the people to an unwonted degree, Hugh Miller was one of the many who displayed literary abilities the existence of which was little suspected by their most familiar friends. In 1839, after the decision of the House of Lords in the Auchterarder Case, the quondam stone-mason drew upon himself the eyes of his countrymen by his Letter from one of the Scotch People to the Right Hon. Lord Brougham and Vaux, on the Opinions expressed by his Lordship in the Auchterarder Case. This "elegant and masculine production of Hugh Miller"—as it was denominated by Mr. Gladstone in his Church Principles—led to the establishment, by the Free Church Party, of The Witness, a semi-weekly newspaper, and the letter-writer was invited to assume its editorial chair. He accepted the proffered position, and retained it until his death with great and increasing reputation. In this journal he gave to the world the results of the geological investigations to which his mind had first been directed when the specimens were literally sub oculis manibusque of the quarryman, whose mind was as hard at work as the muscles exercised in his daily labour. These scientific papers elicited the commendation of Sir Charles Lyell, Sir Roderick Murchison, and Dr. Buckland, and the author was encouraged to continue his researches and to communicate the results of his observations to the public. With what success this has been done is well known to the world. Mr. Miller's publications have appeared in the following order: 1. A volume of Poems, already noticed. 2. Scenes and Legends of the North of Scotland, Edin., 1835, 12mo; 2d ed., 1850, 12mo.

"This is a well-imagined, a well-written, and a somewhat remarkable, book. . . . The language is clear; the sentiments are always pleasing, and often original; he communicates information with the readiness of one whose mind is full of it; and he is equally easy and skilful in the narrative and the dramatic."—Lon. Athen., 1835, p. 260.

3. The Old Red Sandstone; or, New Walks in an Old Field, 1841, 12mo; 3d ed., 1847, 12mo; 1849, 12mo; 4th ed., (in Collected Works,) 1857, cr. 8vo; 1st Amer. ed., Bost., 1851, 12mo; 7th ed., Glasgow and Bost., 1858, 12mo. To this ed. is appended a Series of Geological Papers read before the Physical Society of Edinburgh. The new matter in this edition consists of about one hundred pages on the following subjects: Geological Evidences in Favour of Revealed Religion; On the Ancient Grauwacke Rocks of Scotland; On the Red Sandstone, Marble, and Quartz Deposits of Assynt; On the Corals of the Oolitic System of Scotland; On the Fossiliferous Deposits of Scotland. The volume embraces also four additional plates, several new cuts, and an appendix of new notes. New engravings of the previous illustrations have also been made. The papers pub. in a collected shape under the title of The Old Red Sandstone (1st ed., 1841) originally appeared in The Witness, and excited great attention. At the first meeting of the British Association for the Advancement of Science in Glasgow in 1840, Dr. Buckland remarked that "he had never been so much astonished in his life by the powers of any man as he had been by the geological descriptions of Mr. Miller, which had been shown to him in the Witness newspaper by his friend Sir C. Menteath. That wonderful man described these objects with a felicity which made him ashamed of the comparative meagreness and poverty of his own descriptions, which had cost him hours and days of labour. . . . He would give his left hand to possess such powers of illustration as this man; and, if it pleased Providence to spare his useful life, he, if any one, would certainly render science attractive and popular and do equal service to theology and geology."

Sir Roderick Murchison remarked that

"Mr. Miller had elevated himself to a position which any man might well envy. He had seen some of his papers on Geology, written in a style so beautiful and poetical as to throw plain geologists like himself entirely in the shade."

On this occasion Sir Charles Lyell also expressed his surprise at the new discoveries of the self-educated geologist.

The Old Red Sandstone was received with great enthusiasm:

"A geological work has appeared, small in size, unpretending in spirit and manner, its contents the conscientious and accurate narrative of fact, its style the beautiful simplicity of truth, and altogether possessing, for a rational reader, an interest superior to that of a novel,—The Old Red Sandstone, by Hugh Miller."—Dr. J. Pye Smith's Relation between Scripture and Geology.

"In Mr. Miller's charming little work will be found a very graphic description of the Old Red fishes. I know not a more fascinating volume on any branch of British geology."—Mantell's Medals of Creation.

"In Mr. Miller we have to hail the accession to geological writers of a man highly qualified to advance the science. The work is to a beginner worth a thousand didactic treatises."—Sir Roderick Murchison's Address to the Geological Society, 1842.

"Il semble que de toute part le terrain devient acquérir une nouvelle importance. M. Hugh Miller vient de faire connaître en détail, dans un joli volume intitulé 'The Old Red Sandstone,' toutes les richesses que ce terrain renferme dans les environs de Cromarty. Le premier, il a découvert ces fossiles de forme bizarre, à caractères hétérogènes, que l'on a tantôt voulu ranger parmi les Tortues, tantôt parmi les Crustacés, et que quelques naturalistes ont même pris pour de grands Coléoptères aquatiques, et dont je crois avoir reconnu la véritable nature en les rangeant parmi les poissons, où ils forment un genre à part, que j'ai désigné sous le nom de Pterichthys."—AGASSIZ.

"This admirable work evinces talent of the highest order, a deep and healthful moral feeling, a perfect command of the finest language, and a beautiful union of philosophy and poetry."—PROF. BENJ. SILLIMAN, LL.D.

"Mr. Miller has thrown the influence of eloquent and powerful writing around the fossils of the Old Red Sandstone."—Tait's Mag.

"Admirable for the clearness of its descriptions and the sweetness of its compositions, as well as for the purity and gracefulness that pervade it."—Edin. Rev.

"As adding much to our knowledge, and placing things previously known in a clear and pleasing light, Mr. Miller's performance will be very acceptable to geologists of the old and young schools."—Lon. Athenæum, 1842, 523.

"Mr. Miller's exceedingly interesting book on this formation is just the sort of work to render any subject popular. It is written in a remarkably pleasing style, and contains a wonderful amount of information."—Westm. Rev.

"'The Old Red Sandstone' was the first purely scientific volume published by Mr. Miller; and it placed him at once in the very front rank of geological observers and writers. Not the least attractive portion of this volume is that which introduces us into a knowledge of the author's own history and tells us how he first became attached to the study of geology, though without being conscious of what he was doing. . . . Never had fishes so fascinating a historian. Their dry bones wake into life beneath his pen, and scenes of the antediluvian world almost become matters of personal knowledge to us."—MISS CHANDLER: N. Amer. Rev., lxxiii. 448–459: Hugh Miller and Popular Science.

"This admirable work has already passed through three editions. From the originality and accuracy of its descriptions and the importance of the researches which it contains, it has obtained for its author a high reputation among geologists; while from the elegance and purity of its style and the force and liveliness of its illustrations it has received the highest praise from its more general readers."—North Brit. Review.

"This is an able, instructive, and suggestive essay upon a subject which has largely engaged the attention of biblical scholars and men of scientific attainments. The leading idea of the author may be stated in the language he quotes from Dr. Chalmers:—'The writings of Moses do not fix the antiquity of the globe.' Mr. Miller's writings are remarkable for the attractive style in which he discourses upon scientific subjects. The lecture before us can be read with interest by the most learned man; yet its style is so clear and popular that a school-boy of ordinary mental training would peruse its pages with delight. We commend this lecture to those who would know how a learned man, with a reverent spirit, can do equal service to the study of theology and geology."

9. The Testimony of the Rocks; or, The Bearings of Geology on the two Theologies Natural and Revealed, [in Twelve Lectures;] with 152 Illustrations. To which are prefixed Memorials of the Author, embracing an Authentic and Minute Account of his Death, &c., Edin. and Bost., 1857, 12mo. The melancholy circumstance which made memorable the night immediately succeeding the completion of this volume is deeply engraved on the minds of all who loved the author and admired his works:

"In the last days [Dec. 24] of 1856," remarks Mr. Bayne, "Hugh Miller died, a self-sacrificed martyr to science. At the great work which was to complete his service to his country and mankind he toiled on with indomitable resolution, amid the paroxysms of fearful disease. His powerful brain, wearied with the sustained tension of twenty years, recoiled from its work, and, as it were, groaned and struggled for rest. But that adamantine will knew no flinching. Ever, as the paroxysm passed by, and the soft glow of the old genius spread itself again along the mind, the most intense and unremitted exertion was compelled. The light burnt nightly in his chamber, long after the midnight hour, as Hugh Miller continued to write, the body failing, the nerves fluttering, the brain still held to its work only by that indomitable will. He feared madness might dash the pen from his hand before the last line was traced. But the work was finished. On the last day of his life Hugh Miller said it was done. Madness and the grave could not deprive him of that. Then, as might have been expected, despite consultation with a physician, the paroxysm returned with redoubled fury: ere it again subsided, Hugh Miller was no more."—Bayne's Essays in Biography and Criticism, First Series: Hugh Miller, Bost., 1857, 361–362.

The sad tale is thus briefly told by a journal of the day:

"The Death of Hugh Miller.

"A post-mortem examination of the body of Hugh Miller was made at his house in Portobello, on Friday, by Professor Miller and other medical gentlemen. The following is the conclusion to which they have come:

"'The cause of death we found to be a pistol-shot through the left side of the chest, and this we are satisfied was inflicted by his own hand. From the diseased appearances found in the brain, taken in connexion with the history of the case, we have no doubt that the act was suicidal, under the impulse of insanity.'

"The following few lines to his wife, found written on a folio sheet lying on the table beside his corpse, give painful evidence of the awful insanity of the disease:

"'Dearest Lydia,—My brain burns. I must have walked; and a fearful dream arises upon me. I cannot bear the horrible thought. God and Father of the Lord Jesus Christ have mercy upon me. Dearest Lydia, dear children, farewell. My brain burns as the recollection grows. My dear, dear wife, farewell.

"'Hugh Miller.'"

The publication of the work for which the world paid so "dear a price" has been so recent that but little opportunity for deliberative criticism has been afforded. We are able, however, to quote a few lines of "testimony" to the merits of The Testimony of the Rocks:

"This work is too well known and fully appreciated to require remark in this place. We wish it may be universally read, as the last message of one who knew by experience the profound truths and harmonies of the two revelations,—the testimony of the rocks and of the written word. The title-page presents the theme of the work in a sentence from Job: 'Thou shalt be in league with the stones of the field.'"—Silliman's Amer. Jour. of Science, July, 1857.

"The purpose of the book is to show that geology tends no more than astronomy has tended to the overthrow of a just faith in natural and revealed religion. . . . From our brief sketch of the contents of this book it may be seen that it has an interest of its own, which would have claimed for it a large share of public attention even had there been only its contents to command curiosity concerning it."—Lon. Examiner.

"We cannot close these pages without the deep feeling of regret that the vigorous hand and brave intellect that are so conspicuous in every page should have so suddenly and painfully ceased to work. We commend the book as a fitting memorial of the mind of a man remarkable for his self-culture, literary ability, accurate science, and manly assertion of his convictions of the truth."—Lon. Athen., 1857, 431.

"As a contribution to science, and as a clear and calm statement of fixed facts, verified by personal observation, it is, like all of Mr. Miller's works, of great value and attractiveness. . . . In none of his works does the peculiar charm of his genius manifest itself more forcibly; in none has he more successfully united keen scientific analysis, and the lucid arrangement of data which satisfy the demands of the student, with the graces of style which delight the general reader, to whom, of course, much of his technical phraseology must be unintelligible."—N. Amer. Rev., Jan. 1858, 272.

We adduce another American "testimony":

"The 'Testimony of the Rocks' has met with a cordial reception here, among scientific readers, for its able contributions to geology; among the religious, on account of its illustration of Biblical history; and among all capable of appreciating original character, for its eloquent expositions, fresh aspects of truth, and the melancholy but endeared associations connected with its preparation."—Henry T. Tuckerman, New York, April 30, 1857.

We may add to the above that all of Miller's geological works enjoy great popularity in America. A new and uniform edit. (5 vols. 12mo) has been recently (1857) issued by Messrs. Gould & Lincoln, of Boston, and another collective edition, several times referred to in this article, is now in course of publication by Constable & Co., of Edinburgh. The Boston ed. is composed of Nos. 3, 5, 7, 8, 9, ante.

The Westminster Review by no means concurs in the commendations, above quoted, of The Testimony of the Rocks:

"A book like this," remarks the critic, "coming forth with the highest moral sanctions, and training the minds of its readers to read and interpret the plainest language into sense widely different, into any sense that may be agreeable, skilling them on all occasions to 'make the worse appear the better reason,' is a power for evil which we should vainly try to estimate."—July, 1857: The Testimony of the Rocks.

Since the above was written, there has been announced (April, 1858) Posthumous Works of Hugh Miller: Volume First, embracing The Cruise of the Betsey; or, A Summer Ramble among the Fossiliferous Deposits of the Hebrides. With Rambles of a Geologist; or, Ten Thousand Miles over the Fossiliferous Deposits of Scotland. This series, to be pub. simultaneously at Edinburgh and Boston, and to appear under the superintendence of the author's widow, will consist of articles contributed to periodicals and of unpublished MSS. left by the author at his death.

Within the last few weeks has appeared Labour and Triumph: The Life and Times of Hugh Miller, by Thomas N. Brown, D.D., Glasgow and N. York, 1858, 12mo. The London Literary Gazette describes this book as only a peg on which to hang the history of the "Free-Church movement in Scotland," and as "written in that intolerably inflated style which finds favour north of the Tweed." "Throughout the book," it adds, "the incidents of Hugh Miller's life bear a secondary place." Another authority styles it "merely a criticism,—biography with no authority." Mr. H. T. Tuckerman speaks of the book in more favourable terms. It is understood that Mr. Miller's successor in the editorial chair of The Witness, Mr. Peter Bayne, favourably known by his Christian Life, Social and Individual, and his Essays in Biography and Criticism, will soon give to the world a biographical account of one whose character, as we have just had evidence, he held in the most ardent admiration.

"A Scottish nobleman," remarks the London Athenæum, "has offered 1000*l.* for the museum collected by the late Hugh Miller: an American college has offered 1000 guineas. The family of the geologist wish to realize their property, and the sale cannot be deferred. A meeting of Scotch gentlemen interested in science and education has therefore been held in Edinburgh, [April 12, 1858,] and a committee named to collect subscriptions with a view to purchase the collection for permanent location in a Scotch museum. We suppose the sum required will be at once raised. England has done its part. The late Government offered a grant of 500*l.*; the present Government will doubtless carry out the intention of their predecessors. Scotland will, of course, do the rest: indeed, we trust that the funds are already raised."—April 24, 1858.

We have quoted some glowing eulogies of the literary merits of Hugh Miller; but, with so many more still unquoted before us, we find it difficult to close an article already sufficiently extended.

"The works of Hugh Miller have excited the greatest interest, not only among scientific men, but also among general readers. There is in them a freshness of conception, a power of argumentation, a depth of thought, and a purity of feeling, rarely met with in works of such character, which are well calculated to call forth sympathy, and to increase the popularity of a science which has already done so much to expand our views of the plan of creation. The scientific illustrations published by Mr. Miller are most happily combined with considerations of a higher order, rendering both equally acceptable to the thinking reader. But what is in a great degree peculiar to our author is the successful combination of Christian doctrines with pure scientific truth."—PROFESSOR AGASSIZ: Introduc. to Amer. ed. of Footprints of the Creator.

"Among the eminent students of the structure of the earth, Mr. Hugh Miller holds a lofty place, not merely from the discovery of new and undescribed organisms in the Old Red Sandstone, but from the accuracy and beauty of his descriptions, the purity and elegance of his compositions, and the high tone of philosophy and religion which distinguishes all his writings. . . . With the exception of Burns, the uneducated genius which has done honour to Scotland during the last century has never displayed that mental refinement and classical taste and intellectual energy which mark all the writings of our author."—SIR DAVID BREWSTER, LL.D., F.R.S.

"He succeeded in placing his name in the first rank of British scientific writers and thinkers. His works are characterized by a fine union of strict science, classic diction, and enchanting description, which rises not unfrequently into the loftiest vein of poetry."—REV. WILLIAM HANNA, LL.D.

"Dr. Chalmers," remarks his son-in-law, Dr. Hanna, "repeatedly said, after the death of Sir Walter Scott, that Hugh Miller was the greatest Scotchman alive."

"One of the most original writers of this age."—REV. ALBERT BARNES: Essays and Reviews, 1855, ii. 346.

"We have read the books and the articles of Mr. Hugh Miller with great admiration. He has a fluent and graceful style,—a good command of language,—a genuine acquaintance with external nature. We, who skipped the geology in them, had nevertheless great pleasure in his books; and when a scientific work interests an unscientific reader the fact is a considerable testimony to its powers. . . . The fervent style and glowing language of the dreamer [in his retrospective geological speculations] touch our imagination into a kindred enthusiasm."—Blackw. Mag., Aug. 1855: Modern Light Literature: Science.

"Not one of the authors of our day has approached Hugh Miller as a master of English composition for the equal of which we must go back to the times of Addison, Hume, and Goldsmith. Other living writers have won a wider celebrity, but they owe it much to the peculiarity of their style or the popularity of their topics. Mr. Miller has taken subjects of science too often rendered dry and repulsive, and has thrown over them the air of an attractive romance. . . . Literature and science have lost in him one of their brightest ornaments, and Scotland one of its greatest men."—Lon. Lit. Gaz.

"On his style it were not easy to confer too high praise. Dr. Buckland did not scruple to inform the world that he 'would give his left hand to possess such powers of description as Hugh Miller.' Recollecting the staid and prosaic habits of professors, we cannot but feel that Dr. Buckland must have been very much struck indeed. The style in question is one of very rare excellence. Easy, fluent, and expressive, it adapts itself, like a silken shawl, to every swell and motion and curve of a subject. It is graphic yet not extravagant, strong without vociferation, measured without formality, classically chaste yet pleasingly adorned. It has the soft flow and easy cadence which marked the best distinctive style of the eighteenth century, stubborned with something of the sterner music of the nineteenth. Such a style belongs only to men of genius. Rich, lucid, pictorial, it casts fascination over the old armour of the pterichthys, or shows a whole geographical district at one view, the physiognomic features strongly brought out and the whole robed in a beauty at once poetic and scientific."—Bayne's Essays in Biography and Criticism: Hugh Miller, 338–339.

"Hugh Miller's First Impressions of England and its People, The Old Red Sandstone, or New Walks in an Old Field, and Footprints of the Creator, are remarkable works of a remarkable man (a stone-quarrier in Scotland) whose fervent and observing mind, and reverent yet bold and inquiring spirit, and admirable self-culture under adverse circumstances, have raised him to the highest rank among geologists and eloquent writers."—President King, of Columbia College: Kent's Course of English Reading, Oakley's ed., 1853, 116.

"A remarkable man, who will infallibly be known."—LEIGH HUNT.

"His style has a purity and elegance which remind one of Irving and Goldsmith."—Lon Spectator.

"Probably no other scientific writer numbers one-half so many unscientific readers as Mr. Miller. His manner is marked by naïveté without offensive egotism, except where his enthusiasm rises without effort into higher eloquence. . . . Mr. Miller possessed, to a degree perhaps never surpassed, that rare power of vision which can adapt itself equally well to the vast and the minute, the distant and the immediate,—can see at the same moment the creation of a world and the unfolding of the flower-bud."—N. Amer. Rev., Jan. 1858, 273.

"We deem it due to truth to commend to still more general regard the great Cromarty stone-dresser and his admirable works. The annals of literature present few instances of a man at once so gifted and so deserving, so situated and so successful; combining so much intellectual bone, muscle, and sinew with exquisite sensibility, a heart so strong, so tender, and so upright, and a soul so genuine, genial, and devout. We know of nothing he has produced which will not well repay a considerate perusal."—Prot. Epis Quar. Rev., Jan. 1856.

"At the triumphant exodus of the Church, when her ministers and members assembled at Canonmills Hall in the full flush of victory and freedom, the appearance of none of her defenders amidst that vast animated throng—where Chalmers, and Welsh, and Gordon, and Cunningham, and Candlish stood conspicuous—elicited plaudits louder and longer than when HUGH MILLER lifted his stalwart form and noble head among the people."—Scottish Guardian.

A specimen of Hugh Miller's style will be found in our notice of SIR DAVID BREWSTER, ante. Miller's biographer in the Gentleman's Magazine, (supra,) speaking of the latter days of this distinguished votary and martyr of science, remarks

"He had now become famous and prosperous, was surrounded by wife, children, and friends, and dwelt at Portobello, near Edinburgh, in a large seaside mansion which he had purchased, adding to it a museum and other fruits of cultivated taste and successful study."

And had he been content with a moderate amount of literary exertion, had he carefully observed those laws of the physical economy which, however held in abeyance for a time, will sooner or later vindicate their authority to the cost of the unwise transgressor, in this abode of peace, plenty, and scientific research he might still have lived and laboured to the continued benefit of his fellow-men and to the undying glory of his own great name.

Miller, Joseph, 1684–1738, a man who, like many others less famous, has enjoyed a great reputation for wit which he never deserved, was noted for his excellent personations on the stage of some of the principal characters in Congreve's comedies. The Jest-Book which has conferred celebrity upon his name was originally pub. in 1739, 8vo, as the compilation of his friend Elijah Jenkins; but the real editor (and author, it is asserted) was John Mottley, the author of the Life of Peter the Great. There were three eds. of Joe Miller's Jests, or The Wit's Vade Mecum, in 1739, all 8vo; a 6th in 1743, and another in 1747, 8vo. We also notice (2) Old Joe Miller: being a Complete and Correct Copy from the best edition of his celebrated Jests; and also including all the Good Things in above 50 Jest-Books published from the Year 1551 to the present time, by the editor of the New Joe Miller, [James Bannatine,] Lon., 1800, 12mo. 3. New Joe Miller, or The Tickler: containing near 2000 Good Things, many of which are original and others selected from the best Authors, 1800–01, 2 vols. 12mo. As regards the modern Joe Miller books, their name is legion, and their wit, generally speaking, not the most recent.

"We cannot expect often to see a work of such magnitude executed in so complete and masterly a style as this edition of Miller's Gardener's Dictionary. It includes a complete and accurate translation of the Genera Plantarum of Linnæus; the exact enumeration of the several species belonging to each genus, with their respective specific characters; accompanied by their various synonymes as well as by the particular history or account of each individual species, with its medicinal, œconomical, and other qualities."—British Critic.

This work was answered by John Bowden, D.D., (see p. 150 of this Dictionary,) in the Apostolic Origin of Episcopacy, in a Series of Letters to Dr. Samuel Miller, 1808, 2 vols. 8vo. On the Eternal Sonship of Christ, 1823. Addressed to Prof. Moses Stuart. 11. Lects. at the Seminary, 1827. 12. Letters on Clerical Manners and Habits, 1827, 12mo. An admirable volume, which —though then, as now, a layman—we took the liberty of reading when a youth, we hope not without profit. And the excellent writer did more than all authors do: he lived his book. When chilled by the cold, repulsive, distant manners that sometimes disgust us in walking statues, clerical and lay, we can warm our hearts at our memories by recalling the cordial, affectionate, winning address of the good Dr. Miller, at whose approach every eye brightened, and of whom, at his departure, every tongue was loud in praise. May the memory of such be held in everlasting remembrance!

"Dr. Miller has a happy talent for the composition of a book. His method, though running out too much into detail, is very perspicuous. His style is marked by an elegant simplicity, and is always intelligible. Generally flowing with the easy sweetness of Doddridge, Newton, and that class of writers on experimental religion, it occasionally rises to the more artificial, condensed, and elevated strain of Hannah More."—Rev. S. Gilman, D.D.: Review of Clerical Manners and Habits: N. Amer. Rev., xxviii. 503–521.

Agnew's Manual on the Sabbath; a number of occasional Sermons, &c.

"Dr. Miller came from the training of city-life, and from an eminently polished and literary circle. Of fine person and courtly manners, he set a high value on all that makes society dignified and attractive. He was pre-eminently a man of system and method, governing himself, even in the minutest particulars, by exact rule. His daily exercise was measured to the moment; and for half a century he wrote standing. He was a gentleman of the old school, though as easy as he was noble in his bearing,—full of conversation, brilliant in company, rich in anecdote, and universally admired. As a preacher, he was clear without brilliancy, accustomed to laborious and critical preparation, relying little on the excitement of the occasion, but rapid with his pen, and gifted with a tenacious memory and a strong, sonorous voice, always instructive, always calm, always accurate."—*Life of Archibald Alexander, D.D., by his son, James W. Miller, Thomas, b. at Gainsborough, Lincolnshire, Aug. 31, 1809, after teaching himself to read and write, started in life as a basket-maker. Some of his poetry happened to fall into the way of Rogers, the poet; and his patronage enabled Miller to establish himself in the bookselling business in London. "Such descriptive passages as the above are the best productions of 'Our Old Town;' for in dealing with its human creatures Mr. Miller becomes vague, and wordy, and sentimental. Mr. Miller appears to be a sensible man, judging from these opening remarks.

Miller, William Allen, M.D., b. Dec. 17, 1817, at Ipswich, Suffolk, Demonstrator of Chemistry in King's College, London, 1840, and Professor of Chemistry in the same institution, 1845, has furnished some scientific papers to the British Association, Phil. Trans., and Phil. Mag., and is the author of the following work: Elements of Chemistry Theoretical and Practical: Part I. Chemical Physics, 1855, 8vo; Part II. Inorganic Chemistry, 1856, 8vo.

"The author's mind appears to be well stored with the facts of his science, but his classifications and explanations are not always so happy as we could wish them to be; and the reason, we imagine, is because he suffers himself to be guided by what he has read, and does not seem accustomed to trust his own independent thought on chemical subjects."—Westm. Rev., April, 1856: notice of Part. II.

Part III. Organic Chemistry, 1857, 8vo.

"The completion of Professor Miller's comprehensive and well-digested treatise in Chemistry, by the publication of the volume devoted to the organic division of the science, will be welcomed as a valuable boon by all such students as desire a wider range of information than the smaller text-books afford. Without being distinguished by any particular originality, either in general plan or in details, his work is eminently characterized by the judgment, in the selection and skill in grouping of its materials, which mark the clear thinker and the experienced teacher; and these are qualities of first-rate importance to the construction of a good text-book."—Westm. Rev., July, 1857.

Milman, Sir Francis, Bart., M.D., 1746–1821, Physician to George III. and the Royal Household, was a native of Devonshire and educated at Exeter College, Oxford. 1. Milman, Henry Hart, D.D., b. Feb. 10, 1791, in London, the youngest son of the preceding, and brother to Sir William George Milman, was educated at Eton College and at Brazennose College, Oxford, received the Newdegate prize for his English poem on the Belvidere Apollo in 1812, and became Fellow of Brazennose in 1815. In 1817 he took holy orders and was appointed Vicar of St. Mary's, Reading; was elected Professor of Poetry in the University of Oxford in 1821; subsequently became Rector of St. Margaret's, Westminster, and a Canon of Westminster; and in 1849 was made Dean of St. Paul's. 1. Fazio; a Tragedy, Lon., 1815, 8vo; 2d ed., corrected, 1816, 8vo. This drama was performed for the first time at Covent-Garden Theatre, Feb. 5, 1818. Charles Kemble and Miss O'Neil personated the principal characters,—Fazio and Bianca. A criticism upon it, as first represented, will be found in Blackwood's Magazine, March, 1818, 667–669,—Notices of the Acted Drama in London.

"We have some difficulty," remarks the critic, "in speaking of this tragedy. If we compare it with the crowd of wretched nothings that have reigned paramount in our national theatres for these ten years past, we shall never have done praising it; but if we judge of it as of what it professes to be,—'an attempt at reviving our old national drama,'—we shall never have done finding fault. Indeed, this attempt to revive the old drama has been the author's stumbling-block all through. He has powers that would have enabled him to construct a fine tragedy if he had chosen to rely on them; but when he betrays a want of confidence in them he must not wonder at their deserting him."—ii. 667, q. v.

"Milman's Fazio is affecting; at least the O'Neil made it so; but it is little more than an ingenious and powerful imitation of the old drama by a man of fine talents and high accomplishments, and as such should be read."—Ibid., xxxix. 267.

"He is far too fond of the superlative degree: scarcely a simile or an epithet is used which does not throw into an extreme that to which it is applied. . . . His plot is a bad one, and he might, with little trouble, have amended it; but he has preferred the merit of conducting a bad plot with some ingenuity: his characters are feeble and unamiable, and he might have easily made them less so; but he has preferred the task of interesting us in them as they are. And, with all their faults, Fazio and Bianca do interest us. . . . But we have a much more agreeable task to perform,—the noticing of beauties which no faults can obscure,—and to that we now gladly address ourselves. . . . Mr. Milman must see by the extent of our remarks the value which we set upon his performance: we have examined his pretensions to public favour with perfect impartiality: it has been sometimes our duty to censure, but more frequently it has been our grateful task to express our approbation of him. . . . That the author of Fazio is blest with no common portion of poetic genius it is impossible to doubt."—Lon. Quar. Rev., xv. 69–85.

"In his 'Fazio,' with many remarkable proofs of genius, there was much to prune away, and much yet wanting which care and cultivation might supply."—Bishop Heber: Lon. Quar. Rev., xxiii. 225.

"We perceive in it, indeed, much vigour of fancy, and considerable power of inventing and sustaining character; but the language certainly strikes us as even more forced and pedantic than we had originally conceived it to be. . . . With the exception of the singularly stiff and foolish scene of Fazio and his flatterers, we think that the author's spirit scarcely ever flags through the drama. He dances, in fact, most vigorously in his fetters: what would he have done had he been wholly free? If his spirit be of the right order, it would have been greatly augmented in energy. . . . We regret, then, that this gentleman, gifted as he evidently is with no ordinary faculties and accomplishments as a poet, did not rely more on his original powers and less on any chosen models of composition, however excellent in their own æra."—Lon. Month. Mag., lxxxiv. 199. See also xcvii. 337.

"A composition full of brilliancy and force,—although not calculated for the stage." Dibdin's Lib. Comp., ed. 1825, 750.

2. Samor, Lord of the Bright City; an Heroic Poem, 1818, 8vo; 2d ed. same year.

"After so much censure, it would be idle to pronounce sentence of unqualified approbation; but we thank Mr. Milman sincerely for much pleasure. There is scarcely a page of the book which does not testify that he is a poet of no ordinary powers. Every one of them exhibits some beautiful expression, some pathetic turn, some original thought, or some striking image. . . . When Mr. Milman was last before us [vol. xv. 69–85, supra] we were not slow to bestow upon him the praise which he did indeed so amply merit, but we then remarked on the faults of his style. Poets perhaps feel a pride in rejecting the admonitions of critics; and Mr. Milman has exceeded himself on the present occasion in the exuberant defects of his own manner. We desire not to be considered as exaggerating our expressions beyond our sober convictions, or merely framing a pointed period, when we say that in this respect Samor exhibits all that is affected in language, strange even to solecism in usage, involved in construction, and meretricious in ornament. We have really sometimes been at a loss how to extricate the commonest idea from the labyrinth of words in which it is lost."—Lon. Quar. Rev., xix. 328–347.

"'Samor' was so overloaded with beauties that the attention was lost and wearied amid a maze of fragrance, and required some sterner and more naked features from which to derive new vigour and refreshment."—Bishop Heber: Lon. Quar. Rev., xxiii. 225.

"He is a fine young man, and his powers are very great. They are, however, better fitted for the drama than for narration: the drama admits his favourite strain of composition, and is easier in its structure. Indeed, it is as much easier to plan a play than a poem of such magnitude as Samor, as it is to build a gentleman's house than a cathedral. . . With less poetry, Samor would have been a better poem. . . . If Milman can perceive or be persuaded of his fault, he has powers enough for any thing; but it is a seductive manner."—Robert Southey to C. H. Townsend, April 12, 1812: Southey's Life and Corresp., chap. xxiii.

Again, Southey remarks, in a letter to Sir Walter Scott, when complaining of the tendency of some of the Roman and Italian poets to overload their overlaboured productions with ornament,

"Henry Milman has spoiled his Samor in this way. It is full of power and of beauty, but too full of them."—March 11, 1819: ubi supra, chap. xxiv.

"The most elaborate and ambitious, but probably the least successful, effort of its author, from its deficiency in nature and simplicity. It is overwritten, and burthened with ornament and illustration. For eloquence we have redundant fluency, and for inspiration, rhetoric."—Moir's Poet. Lit. of the Past Half-Century, 1851, 181.

"In Samor, Lord of the Bright City, there was, perhaps, less energy, but a more equal and stately flow of verse and of imagery. Parts of this poem are prodigally rich and effective."—Dibdin's Lib. Comp., 750.

3. The Fall of Jerusalem; a Dramatic Poem, 1820, 8vo, 1853, 12mo, (Murray's Railway Reading.)

"He has now produced a poem in which the peculiar merits of his earlier efforts are heightened, and their besetting faults, even beyond expectation, corrected; a poem to which, without extravagant encomium, it is not unsafe to promise whatever immortality the English language can bestow, and which may of itself entitle its author to a conspicuous and honourable place in our poetical pantheon, among those who have drunk deep at the fountain-head of intellect and enriched themselves with the spoils without encumbering themselves with the trammels of antiquity."—Bishop Heber: Lon. Quar. Rev., xxiii. 198–225.

"By far the most soaring flight that Mr. Milman has ever hitherto sustained. As a master of the high, serene, antique flow of lyrical declamation, we are free to say that we consider him as far superior to any living poet."—Blackw. Mag., vii. 123–131. See also xi. 369, 375.

"The Fall of Jerusalem quickly caught the public attention, and was crowned with the most general applause. The subject had strong hold upon our sympathies. . . . Mr. Milman has treated it with complete success."—Dibdin's Lib. Comp., 751.

"The funeral anthem has always struck me as particularly fine; and its solemn music has often, through many years, haunted my memory."—Moir's Poet. Lit. &c., 180.

See also Lon. Month. Rev., xcii. 422; New Haven Chris. Month. Spec., ii. 637.

4. The Martyr of Antioch; a Dramatic Poem, 1822, 8vo.

"If we are to judge of the progress of his intellect from the last poem he has published, we must be compelled to say not only that he has acquired no additional strength of imagination, but that even in the minor arts of language and versification he has absolutely retrograded. . . . He possesses many of the finest elements which can enter into the composition of a poet."—Blackw. Mag., xi. 267–280. See also 747, and note.

"The genius of Milman rises on us in the strongest and clearest light. He has burst through the clouds that obscured his early course, and has become (we do not hesitate to say) the sun of our poetical hemisphere. . . . This is indeed a work which exhibits an extraordinary variety of talent, of good feeling, and of good taste."—Lon. Month. Rev., xcvii. 339–347.

5. Belshazzar; a Dramatic Poem, 1822, 8vo.

"The genius which appears most conspicuous in this poem, and perhaps in all the poetry Mr. Milman has given to the world, is that of rich and powerful description. Here his good spirit seems to desert him."—Blackw. Mag., xii. 25–40.

"The Poem of 'Belshazzar' will indeed add nothing to its author's high reputation; and we greatly mistake if Mr. Milman does not already regret his too rapid pursuit of that 'bubble,' fame."—Lon. Month. Rev., xcix. 126–135.

"Belshazzar, if it be less popular than The Fall of Jerusalem, is to the full as poetical. The opening is, to my mind, sublime. Indeed, what subject could possibly excite stronger emotions in the soul of a poet, and in one versed in scriptural lore, than that of the Downfall of Babylon? As a whole, I consider this to be a masterly and successful performance."—Dibdin's Lib. Comp., 751.

6. Anne Boleyn; a Dramatic Poem, 1826, 8vo.

"The author of 'Anne Boleyn' is an accomplished scholar and a poet; but his poetry is more artificial than natural, and for his versification he is occasionally indebted both to Shakspeare and Milton. To a comparison with a production of the former the subject of his present work renders it peculiarly liable; and we think we can perceive that the author of Anne Boleyn found it impossible to resist the force of association and the influence of authority."—Lon. Quar. Rev., xxxv. 351–363.

Also reviewed (together with Henry Montagu Grover's tragedy of Anne Boleyn, 1826, 8vo) in Edin. Rev., xlv. 321–339; and in Lon. Month. Rev., cx. 52–59. Both of these reviews find faults and beauties in Anne Boleyn.

7. The Belvidere Apollo; Fazio, a Tragedy; and other Poems, 182–, 8vo.

"His juvenile lines in the Apollo Belvidere, with more originality than such productions commonly exhibit, had nevertheless all the characteristics, good or bad, of juvenile poetry."—Bishop Heber: Lon. Quar. Rev., xxiii. 225.

"His Oxford Prize Poem and his Fazio, performances in all respects juvenile, are still the best things he has done."—Blackw. Mag., xi. 268: Review of the Martyr of Antioch.

"A singular honour befell our English Apollo,—that of being recited at the foot of the statue (then still in the Louvre) by no less a person than Mrs. Siddons herself. The grace and harmony of the verse are worthy of such a distinction."—Miss Mitford's Recollec. of a Lit. Life, chap. xxxiii.

8. The Character and Conduct of the Apostles considered as an Evidence of Christianity: Eight Serms. at the Bampton Lects., 1827, Oxf., 1827, 8vo. Mr. Milman had been exhorted by a reviewer of his Martyr of Antioch (Blackw. Mag., xi. 280) to publish some serms.; and possibly this hint induced him to accept the invitation to deliver the Bampton Lectures for 1827. A notice of Mr. Milman's characteristics as a pulpit-orator will be found in Pen-Pictures of Popular English Preachers, ed. Lon., 1852, 175–178.

"We shall not pretend to criticise in detail a work of which only one-third part is before us; but we hazard nothing in saying that, high as Mr. Milman's reputation has been for some years past, it will at once be more than doubled by this volume."—Blackw. Mag., xxvi. 424–436: notice of vol. i.

"Mr. Milman's agreeable history of the Jews."—Prescott's Ferd. and Isabella, 11th ed., 1866, ii. 152, n.

"Milman's History of the Jews is a most interesting work, written in a style of uncommon elegance and dignity. It has been the subject of much discussion, not unmixed with severe animadversion. His plan was to write, not the theological, but the civil and military, history of a people devoted to persecution, and to consider what rank they held in the general history of mankind."—Dr. Valpy.

"We are acquainted with no volumes which we can more heartily recommend to our readers: to the younger parts of them especially we are sure they will prove a most agreeable present."—Lon. Lit. Gaz.

"In speaking of the letter which the Bishop of London wrote him, (at the time of the outcry about his 'History of the Jews,') approving highly of the work and condemning the opposition that had been raised to it, Milman told me that the bishop had afterwards got alarmed."—T. We have already quoted many comments upon Mr. Milman's poetical productions; but we add one or two more:

"Henry Hart Milman's genius inclines to dramatic; yet in his regular poems, amid much elaborate splendour, there are scenes of natural emotion, touching pathos, and manly sentiment."—Allan Cunningham's Biog. and Crit. Hist. of the Lit. of the Last Fifty Years.

"His poems are fine examples of sound intellect and cultivated taste; but we look in vain through them for evidence of inventive power and originality of thought. He has little skill in mastering the heart or controlling the feelings."—Mrs. Hall.

"We are always impressed with a conviction of his learning, his ability, and his cultivated taste, but are haunted at the same time with an unsatisfactory feeling that his poetry is rather a clever recasting of fine things already familiar to us than strikingly fresh and original. . . . With less leaning to authorities, and greater reliance on his own powers and impressions, there can be no doubt that Milman would have written far finer poetry and secured a more extended acceptability; for his more simple strains are, after all, those best remembered, and he could be at times alike natural and pathetic."—*Mot'y's Poet. "To the praise of distinguished diligence, great perspicuity, and eminent impartiality Mr. Milman is fairly entitled."—Eclec. Rev.

"It is our duty to offer the sincere tribute of admiration to the spirit in which this learned and sterling production is conceived, to the talent with which the investigations have been conducted, and to the comprehensiveness and mass of information of the deepest value and interest which distinguish it throughout."—Lon. Lit. Gaz.

The Dublin University Magazine, in a review of this work, referring to the disposition of the writer to shield Dr. Milman from the suspicions of unsoundness of doctrine which were elicited by the same author's History of the Jews, remarks,

"The History of Christianity, however, has dissipated these pleasing illusions and convinced us that the general suspicions of Mr. Milman's heterodoxy were too well founded."—xvi. 251–265.

Dr. Williams endorses this charge:

"Mr. Milman's narrative [History of Christianity] is elegant, chaste, and spirited, but unhappily tinged with that Rationalism which has given just offence in some of his other publications."—Christian Preacher, 5th ed., 1843, 358.

"Evincing great research and exhibiting profound knowledge of the subject, it breathes a spirit of peace and tolerance and conciliation which are or ought to be the characteristics of all ministers of the gospel. . . . We see nothing in Mr. Milman's indulgent views beyond those which the most orthodox minister may take; nor are his opinions any thing which the High Churchman may not conscientiously and consistently maintain."—John Bull.

"A safe book for all to read. The divine origin of Christianity, and the authority of the Holy Scriptures, are everywhere maintained."—Preface to he American Edition, by Dr. Murdoch.

15. The Works of Quintus Horatius Flaccus, illustrated, chiefly from the Remains of Ancient Art; with a Life, 1849, r. 8vo, £2 2s.; 1853, 8vo, 9s.; 1856, 2 vols. 8vo, £1 10s. The copies first issued are also arranged so as to be bound in 2 vols., for which proper titles were given. This exquisite ed. is illustrated by 300 wood-cuts of Coins, Gems, Bas-Reliefs, Statues, Views, &c., taken chiefly from the Antique, and drawn on wood by George Scharf, Jr.; the Ornaments and Borders are by Owen Jones, architect.

"Not a page can be opened where the eye does not light upon some antique gem. Mythology, history, art, manners, topography, have all their fitting representations. It is the highest praise to say that the designs throughout add to the pleasures with which Horace is read. Many of them carry us back to the very por traitures from which the old poets drew their inspirations."—Classical Museum.

"Illustrated brilliantly and appropriately, chiefly from remains of ancient art, our darling Latin poet appears here in a form most delightfully befitting him, and consonant to the taste of those who most truly appreciate and admire his genius. Creamy paper, handsome typography, numerous well-executed engravings, adorn the text of the Odes abundantly, and of the Satires, Epistles, and Art of Poetry quite sufficiently."—Lon. Lit. Gaz.

"Altogether the volume is unique in idea and execution."—Lon. M. Chronicle.

"The Illustrations are executed with a fidelity and grace not often so well conveyed in such minute forms; and they have the great charm of appropriateness. They come when they are wanted. Often they light up hints and allusions in the text which without them would be obscure. Usages are explained by their means, descriptions of scenery made more vivid, praise or abuse made matter of nearer personal interest, and satirical expressions accounted for by touches of Roman life and manners, never so quickly and sharply recognisable as in such a series of graphic outlines. In short, the illustrations of the book are its pencil-annotations, and in the selection and arrangement evince extraordinary care and knowledge."—Lon. Examiner.

We need hardly say that Mr. Milman's Life of Horace, and criticisms on his poetry, are well worthy of the respectful attention of the Latinist.

"Of the editor of this eminently beautiful and splendid edition of the works of Horace it is almost superfluous for us to speak. Dean Milman, as a poet, an historian, and a critic, has already earned for himself a station in literature which no commendation of ours would render more certain or conspicuous. His Life of Horace is, of course, not a performance which can add much to his literary fame. To a scholar so accomplished and to so experienced a writer, it was probably the work of leisure hours. It is, however, both well written and—what with such a subject is of essential importance—gracefully and genially conceived, and should be taken into account by every subsequent editor of the Roman Lyrist." —Edin. Rev., xcii. 533–574: Horace and Tasso.

By all means read this valuable paper. See also the article in the same volume, 468–491, entitled Recent Classical Romances.

16. The History of Latin Christianity, including that of the Popes to the Pontificate of Nicholas V., 8vo: vols. i.–iii., 1854. [To Innocent the Third, 1198.]

"This book will add to the reputation of Dean Milman. It may not altogether please any party in the church; it may be thought too liberal by some, and too rationalistic by others; but it will commend itself to the judgment of the candid and thoughtful of all classes and sections, and will, in the end, establish for itself an honourable position in our literature. It is a continuation of the author's 'History of Christianity to the Extinction of Paganism in the Roman Empire,' and yet in itself is a complete work."—Lon. Athen., 1854, 431–433.

Vols. iv.–vi., 1856. (Innocent the Third to Nicholas the Fifth, 1198–1454.)

"As an historical abridgment Dean Milman's work deserves to rank amongst the best of its class. In expression it is occasionally redundant, and its style is frequently heavy and laboured; but it is founded upon honest and copious research, and will, therefore, take a permanent stand in our literature. In statement the author is bold, and in opinions liberal."—Ibid., 1856, 1430–1432.

Second ed. of the whole work, revised, with an Index, 1858, 6 vols. 8vo; £3 12*s.*

"No such work has appeared in English ecclesiastical literature, —none which combines such breadth of view with such depth of research, such high literary and artistic eminence with such patient and elaborate investigation."—Lon. Quar. Review.

"These volumes give a charm to a period of the church's history which is generally but little studied, and too often regarded as a desert."—Lon. Chris. Remembrancer.

"One of the remarkable works of the present age, in which the author reviews, with curious erudition and in a profoundly philosophical spirit, the various changes that have taken place in the Roman hierarchy; and, while he fully exposes the manifold errors and corruptions of the system, he shows, throughout, that enlightened charity which is the most precious of Christian graces, as unhappily the rarest."—Prescott's Philip the Second. 1856, ii. 500, n., 69.

"If it seems to you high praise, I believe no one who has carefully read the extraordinary work to which it refers will consider it higher than the book deserves."—Wm. H. Prescott to the author of this Dictionary, Jan. 1, 1858.

To Mr. Milman we are also indebted for a number of articles contributed to the London Quarterly Review. We regret that these have not yet been published in a collective form, but hope that they will be thus presented to the public before their learned author will feel himself entirely discharged from literary duties. Why, indeed, should we not hope for other important works from a pen which its master wields with such facility?

Milner, John, D.D., 1752–1826, a native of London, educated at Douay, was ordained priest in the Roman Catholic Church in 1777, and appointed pastor of the chapel at Winchester in 1779; Vicar-Apostolic of the Midland District and Bishop of Castabala in partibus, 1803,—when he changed his residence to Wolverhampton. He pub. a number of single discourses, several controversial tracts in defence of the tenets of his Church, &c., 1789–1818. The most important of his works are (1) The History, Civil and Ecclesiastical, and Survey of the Antiquities, of Winchester, (1798–99,) 2 vols. 4to; 12 copies on large paper; Supp., 1800, 4to; Second Appendix, 1801, 4to. The Second Appendix was never printed on large paper. 2d ed. of the whole work, corrected and enlarged, 1809, 2 vols. 4to. The paper and plates of the first ed. are better than those of the second. 3d ed., 1839, 2 vols. r. 8vo, £1 4*s.*; Proofs, £2 5*s.* The author did not forget his Church when he prepared this work; but it is one of great value nevertheless.

"Had we any hope that our remonstrances would be attended to, we would earnestly recommend what no Protestants, we believe, ever recommended to a Catholic before,—an editio expurgata. Let not the vanity, or, if he please, the consistency, of our author be alarmed at such a proposal. The suppression of all the controversial passages would imply no acknowledgment of the unsoundness of the principles which they inculcate, but merely that, in a work of this nature, they are misplaced and unseemly, and that when even a divine undertakes merely to write a history he is under no obligation of conscience either to preach or to debate. The work might thus be contracted into one handsome volume, the page expanded, the epitaphs (an improvement which, for the sake of effect, we would specially recommend) printed in their proper characters; and the History of Winchester, then become inoffensive to the feelings of the Protestant reader, would remain equally gratifying to the taste, though not to the prejudices, of the Catholic.

"As it is now presented to us, we have freely and conscientiously animadverted upon its defects; and with respect to its general merits (as it is a performance which will always keep its place among the few standard works in English topography) we scruple not to pronounce that, with one superior among its own class in point of original genius and several in classical erudition and elegance with respect to what ought to have been its own peculiar object,—monastic antiquities, to science in discriminating the peculiarities and taste in appreciating the beauties of monastic architecture,—the History of Winchester stands unrivalled and alone."—Lon. Quar. Rev., iii. 347–368.

See Upcott's English Topog., i. 288–292. Some of the ecclesiastical comments of the author elicited from Dr. John Sturges a work entitled Reflections on the Principles and Institutions of Popery, &c., Lon., 1799, 4to; 1800, 4to. Dr. Milner replied in Letters to a Prebendary, &c., Winchester, 1800, 4to, in which he boldly defended the doctrines of his Church. Upwards of six edits. have been pub. in 8vo.

"The service which this work has rendered to the Catholic cause is very great."—CHARLES BUTLER.

It will be remembered that Milner had a controversy with Charles Butler also: see p. 312, ante. In 1799, 8vo, appeared A Letter to John Milner, D.D., occasioned by his Aspersions on the Memory and Writings of Dr. Benjamin Hoadly, formerly Bishop of Winchester, by Robert Hoadly Ashe, D.D., 1799, 8vo.

2. The End of Religious Controversy, 1818; 2d ed., 1819, 8vo; 1824, 8vo; new ed., 2 vols. 8vo; other eds. reprinted in New York and Baltimore. In 1822, Lon., 8vo, Dr. Milner pub. A Vindication of The End of Religious Controversy from the Exceptions of Bishop Burgess and the Rev. R. Grier. The last answer to this defence of the doctrines of the Roman Catholic Church was pub. by Bishop Hopkins: see HOPKINS, JOHN HENRY, D.D., No. 9. See R. S. Mackenzie's ed. of Shiel's Sketches of the Irish Bar, New York, 1856, ii. 195–199; Blackw. Mag., xxiv. 23, xxix. 903.

"Mr. O'Connell expressed his obligations upon this occasion to Dr. Milner's celebrated, and, let me add, admirable, work, which has been so felicitously entitled 'The End of Religious Controversy.' 'Oh!' said the doctor, 'I am growing old, or I should write a supplement to that book.' . . . . I heard Mr. [Charles] Butler express himself of Dr. Milner as a person of vast erudition, and one who reflected honour, by the purity of his life and the extent of his endowments, upon the body to which he belonged."—O'Connell and Shiel's Visit to Milner: ubi supra.

Milner, Joseph, 1744–1797, a native of the vicinity of Leeds, entered Catherine Hall, Cambridge, 1762; became successively Head-Master of the Grammar-School at Hull, and lecturer in the principal church of that town; Curate and afterwards Vicar of North Ferriby; and, just before his death, Vicar of Holy Trinity Church, Hull. 1. The author lived to prepare for the press only the first three vols., which carry the history to the 13th century. The remaining two vols., or, rather, two parts, edited by Isaac Milner, reach to the 16th century. New eds., with Additions by Isaac Milner, were pub. 1819, 5 vols. 8vo; 1824, 5 vols. 8vo; 1827, 5 vols. 8vo; 1834, 5 vols. 8vo. Last and best ed., with the Additions and Corrections of Isaac Milner, revised and corrected throughout by the Rev. Thomas Grantham, B.D., Rector of Bramber and Chaplain to the Bishop of Kildare, 1847, 4 vols. 8vo: vol. i., Cent. 1–4; ii., Cent. 4–11; iii., Cent. 12–16; iv., Cent. 16 continued; Index. This is the only edition which must tempt the student. There is another ed., with Isaac Milner's Additions, and a further Continuation to the Present Time, extracted from the Rev. T. Haweis's Church History, Edin., 1840, 8vo; an Abridgment by Isaac Milner, new ed., (Christian's Fam. Lib., vol. xiii.,) 1844, fp. 8vo; and a History of the Church of Christ from Milner, with a Continuation, 6 vols. 12mo, pub. by the London Religious Tract Society. There is also a Continuation of Milner's History, with Isaac Milner's Additions, by Rev. J. Scott, in 3 vols. 8vo, 1826–28–31; and another Continuation from 1530 to the XVIII. Century, by Rev. Henry Stebbing, in 3 vols. 8vo, 1839–42. As regards the character of Milner's Church History, we shall find a wide difference of opinion expressed:

"The Milners were no ordinary men. Their pure and elevated standard of scriptural truth, their discrimination and acuteness of judgment, their bold avowal of Christian doctrine, their disregard of the passing taste of the times, their originality and independence of mind, their knowledge of the human heart, their thorough understanding of their subject, . . . their combination, in short, of great qualities, both natural and acquired, have placed their volumes very high in the rank of religious productions."—BISHOP WILSON, of Calcutta.

"Milner will ever be valued by the Christian mind for his History of the Church of Christ,—an inestimable treasure of evangelical truth and Christian experience, continuing the History of the Church of Christ, in the very spirit of the sacred writers, as far as human infirmity can tread in their steps. . . . A work eminently pious and useful, having much of the mind of the Spirit. The best history of the real Church, and ably continued, [by Isaac Milner.] . . . . In his Reflections on Ecclesiastical Establishments [in vol. ii. of his History] he speaks with much power of mind and good sense on a difficult subject."—Bickersteth's C. S., 4th ed., 320, 426, 509.

"If Mosheim's Ecclesiastical History have been, a little too epigrammatically, styled the History of Sinners, that of the late Dr. Milner has been as concisely called the History of Saints. But the latter is a learned and valuable work, dashed though it may be with some little spice of Calvinism. The chapter on Religious Establishments (I think it is under the reign of Theodosius) has been mentioned to me as admirable. And the work has many particulars relating to our Reformation in which Mosheim is almost necessarily deficient. I cannot, therefore, dispense with the possession of this spiritedly-executed performance."—Dibdin's Lib. Comp., ed. 1825, 126.

"A work like Milner's is still worse and more useless than Mosheim's . . . simply because he was a man of feeble powers and limited views. . . . This book, which has no intrinsic value, ... will sink totally into merited neglect."—Hugh James Rose's Terminal Divinity Lect. before the Univ. of Durham.

Quoted by Rev. John Scott in his Vindication of Milner and his History against Rose's Terminal Divinity Lect., &c., 1834, 8vo.

"To his 'History of the Church' we have often referred in these volumes. [Chalmers's Biographical Dictionary,] as it appears to us of more authority in many respects than that of Mosheim; and, whatever difference of opinion there may be as to the view Mr. Milner takes of the progress of religion, he appears to have read more and penetrated deeper into the history, principles, and writings of the fathers and reformers than any preceding English historian."—Chalmers's Biog. Dict., xxii. 177.

"Of the two most popular compilers of church-history, Mosheim gives the mere husk of history; Milner, nothing but some separated particles of pure farina."—ISAAC TAYLOR, author of Natural Hist. of Enthusiasm.

"I would take this opportunity of observing that they who have seen cause to regret that the History of Mosheim presents rather an external than an internal view of the Church of Christ, and who perceive that the pious Milner did not altogether possess the extent of information or the freedom from party spirit requisite to his undertaking, will find in the History of Weismann both the piety of the latter and the historical fulness and accuracy of the former."—Conybeare's Bampton Lect.

Of course the theological student must secure C. E. Weismann's Historia Ecclesiastica, edita optima, revisa, emendata et aucta, Halæ, 1745, 2 vols. 4to. Comparisons between Mosheim's and Milner's church-histories will be found in the British Critic, vols. xl. and xli. See also MACLAINE, ARCHIBALD, D.D., No. 2, in this Dictionary.

We continue the quotations, favourable and unfavourable, on Milner's History:

"Milner has combined more real piety and sound sense in these volumes than are to be found in half the books of the day."—DR. BUCHANAN.

"With all its very great defects, Milner's Church History is incomparably the best that has ever been compiled. The worst is, it is mistaken for a model, and has been supposed to supersede a better."—Eclec. Rev., 1829.

"Milner, estimable as he was for his piety, produced a work which merely proved how strangely he was destitute of the information most indispensable to the ecclesiastical historian."—REV. JOHN G. DOWLING.

The British Critic for 1835 remarks of Dr. R. S. Maitland's Second Letter to the Rev. H. J. Rose, containing Notes on Milner's History of the Church in the Fourth Century,

"It seems to settle forever the pretensions of Milner as a searcher into original authorities, whatever may be the merits or demerits of his work in other respects."

"I must mention, before I conclude, the last two volumes of Dean Milner's Ecclesiastical History. They are written, like the principal part of the work, by his brother, upon a particular system of doctrine; but with this, as a lecturer of history, I have no concern. The reason for which it is necessary that I should recommend them to your attention is this: that they contain, particularly in the life of Luther, the best account I know of the more intellectual part of the history of the Reformation; in other words, they contain the progress of the Reformation in Luther's own mind,—a very curious subject. Such were the great talents and qualities of Luther, and such was the situation of Europe at the time, that the Reformation, in fact, passed from the mind of the one into the mind of the other. I therefore consider these two volumes, particularly in the lives of Wickliffe and Luther, as a most entertaining and valuable accession to our general stock of information, and one that may be considered as accessible to every student. Dr. Milner appears to me too determined a panegyrist of Luther. This, however, may be forgiven him; not to say that it becomes me to speak with diffidence, when I speak to differ from one whom I know to have been able and whom I conceive to have been so diligent."—Prof. Smyth's Lects. on Modern Hist., Lect. X.

"Milner, who is extremely partial in the whole of this history, [the Reformation under Luther,] labours to extenuate the claims of Zwingle to independence in the preaching of reformation. . . . The prejudice of Milner against Zwingle throughout is striking, and leads him into much unfairness. . . . Milner's very prolix history of this period is rendered less valuable by his disingenuous trick of suppressing all passages in these treatises of Luther which display his antinomian paradoxes in a strong light. Whoever has read the writings of Luther up to the year 1520 inclusive must find it impossible to contradict my assertion. In treating of an author so full of unlimited propositions as Luther, no positive proof as to his tenets can be refuted by the production of inconsistent passages."—Hallam's Lit. Hist. of Europe, 4th ed., 1854, i. 295, n., 298, n., q. v.

"We need scarcely say how earnestly we recommend the whole work to our readers, especially the younger class, from whom it well merits close and impartial attention."—Lon. Christian Observer.

With a commendatory notice, from the same periodical, of the last ed., (Lon., 1847, 4 vols. 8vo,) we close our record of clashing opinions upon this important work:

"Of Milner's Church History it is quite unnecessary to say any thing in the present day, as its merits have been fully discussed, and its reputation for the purpose for which it was intended fully established. It was written at a time when but little attention had been given to the study of ecclesiastical history in this country, and consequently shews less learned research than, under other circumstances, might have been expected. But for the great purpose for which it was intended—i.e. as a history of the progress of true religion—its value is great. And several of the deficiencies observed in previous editions have been supplied in the new, accurate, and well-executed edition noticed at the head of this article. Mr. Grantham has carefully verified all the references, (which were given somewhat loosely before,) and so increased their number as to leave few important facts or statements without a notice of the authority on which they rest. He has also corrected all the errors which either he himself has discovered or which had been pointed out by others. In short, the work has been very diligently revised, and the edition is in every respect such as to reflect credit upon the editor. We can give to these volumes our cordial recommendation."

We have seen that the Rev. Hugh James Rose attacked Milner's History in his Terminal Divinity Lecture, &c., and that the Rev. John Scott pub. A Vindication of Rev. Joseph Milner and his History, &c., (supra,) Lon., 1834, 8vo; Dr. S. R. Maitland pub. two letters to Mr. Rose on the subject, (1834 and 1835,) and one to the Rev. John King; the Rev. John King gave to the world two tracts on the same theme, (1836, &c.;) and the Rev. John Goulter Downing also pub. a letter—On the Opinions of the Paulicians—to Dr. S. R. Maitland. (See the titles of these tracts in Lowndes's Brit. Lib., 1286–1287.) 5. Practical Serms., 1801–09–23, 3 vols. 8vo. Various dates will be found on different impressions of these three vols. Pub. for the benefit of the Church Missionary Society.

"Simplicity, vigour of thought, and honest plainness and sincerity distinguish these, as they do all his other published discourses. Such sermons, in all their roughnesses, are far better suited than merely polished disquisitions on theological subjects to awaken the conscience, convert the sinner, and establish the Christian."

9. Thirty-two Sermons on the Colossians, Thessalonians, and the Epistle of James; with Three on Full Assurance, by the Rev. J. Fawcett, of Carlisle, 1841, 8vo. Bickersteth cannot say enough in praise of Milner's Sermons. (See Nos. 5 and 8, supra.)

"Original sermons, full of pungency and experimental unction . . . His sermons are searching, and yet full of the gospel."—Christian Student, 4th ed., 320, 495.

Again:

"The sermons of such as Bishops Reynolds and Beveridge, Milner, Richardson, Simeon, Jamieson, &c. will furnish more especially those evangelical doctrines which, clearly exhibiting salvation by Christ, are alone eminently blessed of God in giving spiritual life to the hearers."—Ibid., 364.

"Milner's Practical Sermons," remarks the London Christian Observer, "are characterized by boldness, strength, and fidelity in exposing the prevailing errors and corruptions of human nature and exhibiting the gospel of Christ as a sovereign remedy for both. . . . They are plain and artless, but earnest and powerful, discourses, such as John Bradford, Hugh Latimer, or Edwin Sandys would have delivered to their congregations; and the doctrines are exactly those of our reformers from Popery. Indeed, we have often been reminded of honest Latimer in perusing these sermons of Mr. Milner, and been carried back in imagination to the best and purest times of the Church of England, when all her bishops and clergy preached according to her Articles and Homilies."

10. His Works Complete; now first collected and edited by his brother, Isaac Milner, 1810, 8 vols. 8vo. Vols. i.–v. contain the Church History; vols. vi. and vii. Practical Sermons; and vol. viii. (No. 6, supra) Tracts and Essays. Complete Works again, 1827, 9 vols. 8vo.

"Milner's works altogether are full of instruction to the student. . . . An invaluable collection of important works for a student." —Bickersteth's C. S., 320, 444.

"Joseph Milner," remarks Mr. Bickersteth, in another place, "was no common character. He had—what God has ever blessed with most extended usefulness—a clear discernment of the main doctrines of the gospel, arising not from human instruction, but from the practical experience of those doctrines in his own heart and life, through the teachings of the divine word and the Spirit of Christ. This gave a vigour and decision to his mind that made him, like Luther, a suitable instrument for the extensive revival of evangelical doctrine in the Church in which he ministered."

Milnes, Richard Monckton, M.P., b. 1809, the son of Robert Pemberton Milnes, Esq., of Frystone Hall, and Bawtry, Yorkshire, by the Hon. Henrietta Maria, fourth daughter of Viscount Galway, graduated M.A. at Trinity College, Cambridge, in 1831, was returned for Pontefract (which he still represents) in 1837, and in 1851 was married to the Hon. Arabella Hungerford, youngest daughter of the second Baron Crewe. Mr. Milnes has always pursued so independent a course in Parliament, voting according to his convictions of public duty, without regard to party nomenclature, that it is rather difficult to know how to classify him; but perhaps the term Moderate Conservatism would best distinguish the line of policy which can reckon most confidently on his support.

"His poetry, while possessing unusual merits of a certain kind, is yet defective and ineffectual from the want of the poetic soul. It wants impulse and glow. It is elaborate, elegant, stately, and sonorous in form and movement, generous, moral, and devout in sentiment, bearing with it an air of philosophical pretension and shaded by a gentle touch of melancholy. But there is a frequent want of ease, and a straining after what is original and striking both in sentiment and diction, which turn the pleasure of perusal into laborious effort. The reader is not borne on by the current, but is obliged to bend his mind with an effort and make a study of the verses. The poem entitled 'The Marvel of Life' will illustrate and justify these general remarks."—H. WARE, JR.: N. Amer Rev., xlix. 348–354.

"Mr. Milnes possesses not only the painter's eye, as the following excerpt will show, but also the musician's ear. . . . "His poetry is the poetry of reflection, and not of passion, and is a transcript of trains of thought rather than of moods of feeling; nor does it abound with the element of the purely picturesque. It commends itself by a certain thoughtful elegance, a pure and correct tone of feeling, a delicate spirit of observation, and a scholarlike grace of style. To the endowments of a great poet, the life-giving breath of inspiration, the creative power of genius, that soars into the highest heaven of invention, and subdues, melts, and moulds the heart at will, he can hardly lay claim; but he may justly aspire to no mean rank among those poets whose aim it has been to make men wiser and happier by their thoughts and affections, who have drawn 'that wisdom which is love' from the many-colored scenes of life, and who have found the seeds of poetry springing up in the furrows of the common heart and mind. He is fully as much of a philosopher as of a poet; and the interest and value of his poetry are derived as much from the thoughtful spirit which breathes through it as from the more strictly poetical element. Nor does he escape the faults to which poetry of this class is exposed. He is sometimes tame and monotonous, dwelling too much upon particulars and details, and giving to his subject an injudicious expansion; and sometimes he clothes in the form and body of verse what is essentially prosaic, and what by no change of garb can be made otherwise."—GEO. "The poetry of Richard Monckton Milnes," remarks a fellow-contributor to Blackwood's Magazine, "possesses very considerable elegance and taste, a philosophic sentiment, and a graceful tenderness, but is deficient in individuality and power, although perhaps not so much so as might at first seem: for, as in Henry Taylor's, the grand pervading element is repose: his sunset has no clouds, and his morning no breezes. From his lack of constructiveness and dramatic passion, he appears to most advantage in his serious, his sentimental and descriptive sketches, many of which are fine and striking, although he often mars the general effect by unnecessary analysis. He may be said to have followed more in the wake of Wordsworth than of any other preceding poet, although his admiration for Keats and Shelley is not unseldom apparent. His narrative is wanting in rapidity and action, and is apt to fall into a pleasing monotony and languor, from which we are not roused by salient points: the current of his thoughts would be vivified by more frequent breaks and waterfalls. Hence his 'Poetry for the People' was a misnomer; for, instead of being circumstantial and palpable, it was abstract, and beyond the reach of their sympathies. About all the productions of Monckton Milnes there is an artist-like finish; and his ear is finely attuned to the melodies of verse."—*Moir's Sketches of the Poet. Milton, Sir Christopher, 1615–1682, a brother of the great poet, became a Roman Catholic when beyond his seventieth year, if we are to credit many authorities against Dodd's Church History, (iii. 416.) He was made a Baron of the Exchequer, April 26, 1686, and shortly afterwards was appointed one of the Judges of the Common Pleas; being one of those who, with Sir Richard Allibone,—made a Justice of the King's Bench, April 28, 1687,—were invested with office by King James II. in defiance of the law which limited occupancy to the professors of the Protestant religion. Milton, John, December 9, 1608–November 8, 1674, one of the most illustrious of his race for genius, philanthropy, learning, and virtue, was the son of John Milton, of Bread Street, London, a respectable citizen who devoted the hours of business to his office-engagements as a scrivener and amused his leisure in the evenings by composing good music and bad verses. Those who desire to be gratified by the first can turn to Morley's Oriana, 1601, Sir William Leighton's Tears of a Sorrowful Soul, 1614, and Slayter's Psalms, 1643; and all who imagine that they will be able to endure the latter may refer to the Harleian MSS., 6423, in the British Museum, or to Mr. Hunter's printed specimen in his Critical and Historical Tracts, No. 3, for June, 1850. Mr. Todd, indeed, imputes this precious morceau to John Melton, the author of the Astrologaster, and, on the other hand, Warton and others credit to the worthy scrivener John Melton's volume entitled The Sixe-folde Politician, 1609, 12mo; but, as we have observed in our notice of the latter on a preceding page, Hayley, Farmer, and Reed (no contemptible trio) are of another opinion. The father of the musical scrivener, according to Phillips and Aubrey, was an under-ranger of the royal forest of Shotover, in the vicinity of the city of Oxford, and disinherited his son John in consequence of the latter's having renounced the faith of his forefathers, or, as Mr. Keightley,—not in the best taste in a biographical work,—terms it, "the lately dominant superstition." Mr. Hunter is disposed to question the truth of the generally-received statement that the poet's grandfather (also named John Milton) enjoyed the post of under-ranger; nor does he believe that the rebellious son who so deeply offended him by turning Protestant resided, even for a brief period, in the classic shades of Christ Church, Oxford. Indeed, this zealous antiquary conceives that he has reason to throw strong doubts upon a number of those genealogical points regarding our poet's history which have been implicitly adopted by all his biographers from the time of Phillips and Aubrey. But of speculations arising from unsettled biographical minutiæ it is manifest there is no end; and if we were obliged in this Dictionary to emulate the scrupulous accuracy of the Heralds' College, and present each of our authors to the reader clothed in an unimpeachable coat of arms before we were permitted to speak of his literary productions, neither our reader's patience nor our own pages would be equal to the undertaking. It was in his father's house in Bread Street, London, that the infant Milton first saw that light which no uninspired muse has ever celebrated in strains more majestic, and the loss of which was never deplored in pathos more sublime or more affecting. The "price" paid for such touching eloquence was indeed "too high:" we would that the "offspring of Heaven first born" should have daily "revisited those eyes;" but we rejoice at the might of that imperial genius which could make even the kingdom of darkness tributary to its irresistible sway. After a preparatory course in the humanities, under the careful eye of Dr. Thomas Young, a Puritan divine of Essex, young Milton was placed at St. Paul's School, then presided over by the learned Dr. Gill; and on the 12th of February, 1624, he was entered of Christ's College, Cambridge, where he seems to have wooed the muses and cultivated the classics with equal success. The paraphrases of the 114th and 136th Psalms were written about the time of his entering college; in the next year, 1625, he wrote the beautiful poem entitled On the Death of a Fair Infant dying of a Cough; and this early period of his life was marked by many other indications of that poetical genius which was destined to confer such enduring honours on his name, his language, and his native country. From his early youth it had been settled that the thoughtful child who pursued knowledge with such unwearied avidity, and who always seemed by the sanctity of his opening years to have been set apart for holy purposes from the common herd of men, should assume orders upon his arriving at a suitable age; but this purpose was never carried out.

"By the intention of my parents and friends," he tells us, "I was destined, of a child, to the service of the Church, and in mine own resolutions. Till, coming to some maturity of years, and perceiving what tyranny had invaded the Church, and that he who would take orders must subscribe Slave, and take an oath wit al, which, unless he took with a conscience that he would retch, he must either straight perjure, or split his faith, I thought better to prefer a blameless silence before the sacred office of speaking bought and begun with servitude and forswearing."

Again he tells us,

"My father sent me to Cambridge. There I devoted myself f r the space of seven years to the literature and arts usually taught, free from all reproach and approved of by all good men, as far as the degree of Master, as it is termed."

Upon his leaving college in 1632, Milton, now in the twenty-fourth year of his age, removed to his father's house in Horton, Buckinghamshire, and during this happy period of his life (1632 to '37) he composed his Arcades, Comus, L'Allegro, Il Penseroso, Lycidas, and probably his Latin poem Ad Patrem. He seems now to have abandoned all thoughts of the profession of the law, which he had doubtless seriously meditated. On the 3d of April, 1637, Milton lost that affectionate mother to whose credit he has recorded this honourable character: "Mater probatissima et elcemosynis per vicinium potissimum nota," (Defensio Secunda.) It was natural that, whilst suffering under this great grief, —"going heavily," to use the expressive language of the Psalmist, "like him who mourneth for his mother,"—he should seek in a change of scene to assuage the bitterness of that woe which the sight of each familiar object tended to perpetuate and to increase.

"My father gave me his permission," he remarks, (in his Defensio Secunda.) "and I left home with one servant. On my departure, the celebrated Henry Wooton, who had long been King James's ambassador at Venice, gave me a signal proof of his regard, in an elegant letter which he wrote, breathing not only the warmest friendship, but containing some maxims of conduct which I found very useful in my travels. The noble Thomas Scudamore, King Charles's ambassador, to whom I carried letters of recommendation, received me most courteously at Paris. His lordship gave me a card of introduction to the learned Hugo Grotius, at that time ambassador from the Queen of Sweden to the French court. A few days after, when I set out for Italy, he gave me letters to the English merchants on my route, that they might show me any civilities in their power."

The young traveller next visited Italy,—"the most accomplished Englishman that ever visited her classical shores," says one of his enthusiastic admirers.

"Taking ship at Nice," remarks the delighted traveller, "I arrived at Genoa, and afterwards visited Leghorn, Pisa, and Florence. In the latter city, which I have always more particularly esteemed for the elegance of its dialect, its genius, and its taste, I stopped about two months; when I contracted an intimacy with many persons of rank and learning, and was a constant attendant at their literary parties,—a practice which prevails there and tends so much to the diffusion of knowledge and the preservation of friendship. From Florence I went to Sienna, thence to Rome where, after I had spent about two months in viewing the antiquities of that renowned city,—I experienced the most friendly attentions from Lucas Holstein and other learned and ingenious men,—I continued my route to Naples."

The young Englishman was not so exclusively engrossed with the "antiquities of the renowned city" as to be insensible to more modern specimens of beauty; and it is certain that he was so greatly pleased with the singing of the celebrated Leonora Baroni—whom he heard at Cardinal Barberini's, and probably at other places—that he addressed to her three Latin epigrams, the highest price ever yet paid for the dulcet notes of "singing-men and singing-women" since the days of Jubal, the "father of all such as handle the harp and organ." But, whilst not unwilling thus to beguile his "hours of ease" with the blandishments of polite society, that stern sense of responsibility for all his actions which made him live would not permit him to hold his peace whilst surrounded with so much which he conceived to be detrimental to those important interests which lay nearest to his heart.

"As ever in his great Task-Master's eye"

"Whilst I was on my way back to Rome," (from Naples,) he tells us, "some merchants informed me that the English Jesuits had formed a plot against me if I returned to Rome, because I had spoken too freely of religion: for it was a rule which I laid down to myself in those places, never to be the first to begin any conversation on religion, but, if any questions were put to me concerning my faith, to declare it without any reserve or fear. I nevertheless returned to Rome. I took no steps to conceal either my person or my character, and, for about the space of two months, I again openly defended, as I had done before, the Reformed religion in the very metropolis of Popery."

That this unusual zeal was not dictated by the controversial spirit of the mere logomachist, who gives a wider license to his practice than he allows to his creed, we have evidence sufficient, we think, to satisfy any candid mind, in the words of the traveller himself, who calls

"The Deity to witness that, in all those places in which vice meets with so little discouragement and is practised with so little shame, I never once deviated from the paths of integrity and virtue, and perpetually reflected that, though my conduct might escape the notice of men, it would not elude the inspection of God."

We should not forget to mention that among the distinguished men with whom Milton became acquainted abroad were Galileo, whom he visited in Florence, and John Baptist Manso, Marquis of Villa,—the friend of Tasso,—who accompanied the intelligent stranger in his inspection of the principal curiosities of Naples.

"I experienced from him, as long as I remained there," says Milton, "the most friendly attentions. He accompanied me to the various parts of the city, and took me over the viceroy's palace, and came more than once to my lodgings to visit me. At my departure he made earnest excuses to me for not having been able to show me the further attention he desired in that city, on account of my unwillingness to conceal my religious sentiments."

"The venerable nobleman wrote a Latin distich in our poet's praise, who repaid it by a Latin poem which left far behind any thing written in his honour even by the great Torquato Tasso."—Keightley's Account of the Life, Opinions, and Writings of John Milton, Lon., 1855, 17.

It was whilst at Naples, and before his second visit to Rome just referred to, that Milton received news from home which induced him to abandon his intention of prosecuting his travels:

"When I was preparing to pass over into Sicily and Greece, the melancholy intelligence which I received of the civil commotions in England made me alter my purpose; for I thought it base to be travelling for amusement abroad while my fellow-citizens were fighting for liberty at home."

In August, 1639, after an absence of about fifteen months, Milton returned to England.

"Things being in such a disturbed and fluctuating state, I looked about to see if I could get any place that would hold myself and my books, and so I took a house of sufficient size in the city; and there, with no small delight, I resumed my intermitted studies,—chiefly leaving the event of public affairs, first to God, and then to those to whom the people had committed that task."

Milton now occupied himself in the instruction of his nephews, John and Edward Phillips, and a few more pupils, sons of his intimate friends. At a time of such political excitement it was not to be supposed that so ardent a republican as Milton, and one, too, so capable of appealing in burning words to the hearts of the principal leaders who then divided the nation into two great parties, should long remain silent. In 1641 he gave to the world the first of his polemical treatises,—viz.: Of Reformation touching Church Discipline in England, and the Causes that hitherto have hindered it. This argument against the rule of bishops was succeeded, in the same year, by his work on Prelatical Episcopacy, The Reason of Church Government urged against Prelaty, and some Strictures on a publication of Bishop Hall, and, in 1642, by An Apology for Smectymnuus.

But the erudite scholar and learned controversialist was not too much occupied with thus fighting, as he believed, the battles of his country, to be entirely indifferent to those attractions which are so powerful with weaker mortals:

"About Whitsuntide," (of 1643,) says his nephew Phillips, "he took a journey into the country, nobody about him certainly knowing the reason or that it was more than a journey of recreation. After a month's stay, he returns a married man who set out a bachelor; his wife being Mary, the eldest daughter of Mr. Richard Powell, then a Justice of the Peace, of Forest Hill, near Shotover, in Oxfordshire."

Milton's father-in-law was devotedly attached to the Royal cause, and, of course, surrounded by the civil and ecclesiastical influences of his party: it may, therefore, readily be supposed that a member of his household would find little of congenial society at the fireside of the uncompromising Puritan. Phillips says that the lady's family, after due consideration of the great probability of the success of the Royalists,

"Began to repent them of having matched the eldest daughter of the family to a person so contrary to them in opinion, and thought that it would be a blot on their escutcheon whenever that court should come to flourish again."

Aubrey tells us that the bride

"Was brought up and bred where there was a great deal of company and merriment, as dancing, &c.; and when she came to live with her husband she found it solitary; no company came to her," &c.

In this state of affairs, we need not be surprised that the lady gladly embraced an invitation—suggested, it is thought, by herself—to spend some time at her father's house. The visit was prolonged to what the husband thought an unreasonable length, and he summoned the truant home. His letters remained unanswered. He then despatched a special messenger, "who, to the best of my remembrance," says Phillips, "reported that he was dismissed with some sort of contempt." The indignant husband sued no more, but proceeded to repudiate the fair rebel on the grounds of disobedience and desertion; and, in 1644 and '45, he published four tracts in justification of his course,—viz.: 1. The Doctrine and Discipline of Divorce; 2. Tetrachordon; or, Exposition of the Four Chief Places in Scripture which treat of The Nullities of Marriage; 3. The Judgment of the famous Martin Bucer touching Divorce; 4. Colasterion. We need hardly say that Milton's arguments, if ten times stronger than they were, would amount to nothing at all so long as they were opposed to the express law of Scripture. The Divine Founder of Christianity has settled this matter for all future time; and any alleged divorce which cannot be justified by his authority is null and void, and cannot be made valid by all the courts of law or legislative enactments of Christendom. It has been often said that Milton proved the sincerity of his views in this matter by paying his addresses to the beautiful Miss Davis; and it is supposed that, had nothing occurred to interrupt his attentions, this accomplished woman would have been invited to become the second Mrs. Milton. We doubt this, however. We do not believe that a man so conscientious would have taken a step which if not certainly right—which he could not know it to be—would be deeply criminal, and which without doubt would have rendered him liable to disgrace, imprisonment, and social contempt. We marvel that Milton's warmest apologists are so willing to admit that he was rapidly preparing for his marriage with the fascinating Miss Davis. We rather think that, "being crafty," the sly Puritan caught his truant Royalist bride "by guile." He visited Miss Davis, and probably took care that the late Miss Powell should know where he spent his evenings. The result may readily be imagined. The repentant wife humbled herself at the feet of her repudiating husband, begged to be restored to the home and heart of her deserted lord, and the reconciliation was complete. This event was a happy one for the Powell family for when the cause of the king grew desperate, and his late adherents were in danger of their lives, Mrs. Milton's connexions sought not in vain a place of refuge in the home of the now honoured republican.

In 1644, Milton sent to the press his Tractate on Education, and his Areopagitica, or A Speech for the Liberty of Unlicensed Printing; and in 1648–49 he gave to the world a work intended as a justification of the trial and execution of Charles I., entitled The Tenure of Kings and Magistrates; proving that it is lawfull to call to Account a Tyrant or Wicked King. This was followed in the same year by Observations on the Articles of Peace, and Animadversions on the Scotch Presbytery at Belfast. He now commenced with much zeal the preparation of a work which he had for some time meditated with no little interest. But he had become too important a man to be allowed to remain longer secluded in his library; and in March, 1649, by the appointment of Secretary of State, (which office he held for eight years,) he was obliged to relinquish the writing of, for the purpose of acting an important part in, The History of England. His vigorous pen was soon put in requisition by the chiefs of his political party; and, by order of Parliament, he answered the Eikon Basilike by his Eikonoklastes. In 1649, Salmasius gave to the world, in the Latin tongue, his Defensio Regia pro Carolo Primo ad Carolum Secundum. As the literary champion of the republican cause, Milton was expected to do battle with this doughty antagonist; but those who were less heated in the controversy than others represented to him that the loss of his sight would be the certain penalty of the continued use of his eyes. "I did not balance," he says, "whether my duty should be preferred to my eyes." He persevered, therefore, in his labours; and at an early date in 1651 he put to press his Latin treatise, Pro Populo Anglicano Defensio, contra Claudii Salmatii Defensionem Regiam. This answer was regarded as a great triumph by the republicans and by many others of the opposite party also. Salmasius took his defeat much to heart; and, as he died in the next year, it was alleged that wounded pride had shortened his days. In 1653, Milton followed his wife to her grave; and about this time he became totally blind. (See his Latin Epistles, No. XV.) In 1654, he pub. a reply to Peter du Moulin's Regii Sanguinis Clamor ad Cœlum adversus Parricidas Anglicanas. This response (in which he treated A. More, the publisher of the offensive treatise, as the author of the work) was entitled Defensio Secunda pro Populo Anglicano contra infamen Libellum anonymum cui Titulus Regii Sanguinis Clamor ad Cœlum. More took great umbrage at portions of this vigorous protest against his political sentiments and private acts, and replied in his Fides Publica. Milton returned to the charge in his Authoris pro se Defensio in 1655; More attacked this in a Supplementum; and Milton discharged the last gun in his Responsio.

By the death of his wife Milton was left with three daughters,—the eldest about six years of age, and the youngest a few days old. Under these circumstances, we need not be surprised that he looked around for a suitable protector for his children; and in November, 1656, he was again united in the bonds of holy matrimony to Catherine, daughter of Captain Woodcock, of Hackney. In this connexion he seems to have been truly happy, and was a sincere mourner when, in the beginning of February, 1657–58, only fifteen months after the day of his marriage, he became again a widower. It was upon this melancholy occasion that he gave vent to his grief in that exquisite sonnet,

> "Methought I saw my late espouséd saint > Brought to me, like Alcestis, from the grave," &c.

In 1658 Oliver Cromwell was gathered to his fathers, and his late secretary again lifted his voice in the proclamation of principles which he feared might be endangered, and in 1659 gave to the nation his Treatise of Civil Power in Ecclesiastical Causes, and Considerations touching the likeliest Means to remove Hirelings out of the Church. In the next year the face of affairs was altogether changed by the return of the king and the re-establishment of monarchy; and so important a promoter of "sedition and rebellion" as the opponent of Salmasius was not likely to escape condign punishment. He therefore very naturally took the precaution to keep out of the eye of the new Government until the passage of the Act of Oblivion, August 29, 1660. Milton's fame as a poet and a scholar was so widely spread throughout Europe, and his defence of the execution of Charles I. had made him so obnoxious to the adherents of the sufferer, that we may readily believe he was an object of great interest to the members of the royal family. It is asserted that, after the publication of the Act of Oblivion allowed the blind scholar to resume his accustomed exercise in public places, he was

"one day walking in St. James's Park, when he suddenly heard repeated near him, 'The king! the king!' 'Let us withdraw,' he said to his guide: 'I never loved kings.' Charles II. accosted the blind man: 'Thus, sir, has Heaven punished you for having conspired against my father!' 'Sire,' he replied, 'if the acts that afflict us in this world be the chastisement of our faults, your father must have been very guilty.'"

Another version of this story makes the Duke of York the royal speaker, and the occasion a visit paid by him to Milton's house out of curiosity, and Milton's answer is thus rendered:

"If your highness thinks that misfortunes are indexes of the wrath of Heaven, what must you think of your father's tragical end? I have only lost my eyes: he lost his head."

In 1664, Milton again entered the married state. His third wife was Elizabeth Minshull, not a daughter of Sir Edward Minshull, as has been often alleged, but a child of Randall Minshull, of Wistaston, near Nantwich, in the county of Chester. This lady survived him more than half a century, dying in 1727. It was about this time that his happiness received another important augmentation by his acquaintance with the excellent Thomas Ellwood, the Quaker, whose virtues have been commemorated on an earlier page (555) of this Dictionary. In 1667, Milton gave to the world his Paradise Lost; in 1669, he published Accedence Commenc't Grammar, with Rules for Acquiring the Latin Tongue; in 1670 appeared his History of England, (to the Norman Conquest;) in 1671, Paradise Regained, and Samson Agonistes, delighted the literary public of Europe; in 1672, he sent to the press Artis Logicæ plenior Institutio ad Petri Rami Methodum Concinnata; in 1673, he published a treatise Of True Religion, Heresy, Schism, and Toleration, and what best Means may be used against the Growth of Popery; and in 1674, the year of his death, he put forth his Epistolæ Familiares, (1625 to '66,) and his Prolusiones quædam Oratoriæ in Collegio Christi habitæ, each in one volume. In 1682, 8vo, appeared his Brief History of Moscovia and of other less known Countries lying eastward of Russia as far as Cathay.

"This book was writ by the author's own hand before he lost his sight, and some time before his death dispos'd of it to be printed. But, it being small, the bookseller hop'd to have procured some other suitable piece of the same author's to have joyn'd with it, or else it had been published ere now."—Advertisement at end of Preface.

How far Milton assisted his nephew, Edward Phillips, in the Theatrum Poetarum Anglicanorum, it is impossible to decide: the criticisms on Shakspeare and Marlowe are ascribed to the uncle with great confidence. The sad intelligence of the death of one who had filled so large a space in the history of his times, and who had laboured so zealously and so fearlessly for the advancement of civil and religious liberty, produced a profound sensation in Europe. Four days after his death his remains were carried to the church of St. Giles, Cripplegate.

"The funeral was attended," says Toland, "by all the author's learned and great friends in London,—not without a friendly concourse of the vulgar."

Milton was a little under the middle size, and possessed a muscular, well-compacted frame. His hair was light brown, his eyes gray, face oval, and his complexion ruddy, even in his later days. He was an excellent musician, performed well on the organ and bass-viol, and accompanied the instrument with his voice. He indulged moderately in the pleasures of the table, lived by exact rule in all things, and, of course, was an early riser.

"My morning haunts," he tells us, "are where they should be,—at home; not sleeping, nor concocting the surfeits of an irregular feast, but up and stirring: in winter, often ere the sound of any bell awaken men to labour or to devotion; in summer, as oft as the bird that first rises, or not much tardier, to read good authors or cause them to be read till the attention be weary or the memory have its full freight; then with useful and generous labours preserving the body's health and hardiness, to render lightsome, clear, and not lumpish obedience to the mind, to the cause of religion and our country,—liberty,—when it shall require our firm hearts in sound bodies to stand and cover their station."

In early youth he had been accustomed to pursue his studies until a late hour:

"My father destined me, while yet a child, to the study of polite literature, which I embraced with such avidity that from the twelfth year of my age I hardly ever retired to my rest from my studies till midnight,—which was the first source of injury to my eyes, to the natural weakness of which were added frequent headaches."

In his later years he retired to bed at nine o'clock and rose at four in the summer and five in the winter season. After his morning-devotions, he had a chapter of the Hebrew Bible read to him, then breakfasted, and studied until twelve, at which hour he dined. After dinner he took an hour's exercise; played on the organ or bass-viol; studied again until six o'clock; conversed with his visitors (of whom he had a superabundance) until eight took a light supper; smoked (if the truth must be told, to the great encouragement, doubtless, of the consumers of the Virginia weed) a pipe of tobacco; drank a glass of water, and then retired to rest. As we have already intimated, the curiosity of visitors who flocked to his house to behold a man so famous became rather a burdensome tribute. He was waited upon by many distinguished foreigners, some of whom, Aubrey tells us, came to England for no other purpose than to see Cromwell and Milton.

"He was mightily importuned," says Aubrey, "to go into France and Italy: foreigners came much to see him, and much admired him, and offered him great preferments to come over to them."

Of a visit of one of his own countrymen Jonathan Richardson gives us the following account:

"An ancient clergyman of Dorsetshire—Dr. Wright—found John Milton in a small chamber hung with rusty green, sitting in an elbow-chair and dressed neatly in black; pale, but not cadaverous; his hands and feet gouty, and with chalk-stones. . . . He used also to sit in a grey coarse cloth coat at the door of his house near Bunhill Fields, in warm, sunny weather, to enjoy the fresh air, and so, as well as in his room, received the visits of people of distinguished parts as well as quality."

The same authority informs us that

"He had a gravity in his temper, not melancholy, or not till the latter part of his life, not sour, not morose or ill-natured, but a certain severity of mind,—a mind not condescending to little things."

It will be understood that when we quote "Jonathan Richardson" we intend to designate the Notes on Milton pub. by Jonathan Richardson and his son Jonathan in 1734, (post.)

Milton's daughter Deborah testifies that her father was "delightful company, the life of the conversation, and that on account of a flow of subject and an unaffected cheerfulness and civility." The great poet had five children,—viz.: By his first wife (1) Anna, b. 1646, married a master-builder, and d. not long afterwards; 2. Mary, b. 1648, d. unmarried; 3. John, b. 1650, d. in infancy; 4. Deborah, b. 1652, married Abraham Clarke, a weaver in Spitalfields, and d. 1727. By his second wife (5) A daughter, who lived only a few hours. Deborah was visited by Addison, and, being in straitened circumstances, received from him a handsome present; and she was well known to Prof. Ward, of Gresham College, and to Jonathan Richardson. Her son, Caleb Clarke, emigrated to Madras in the commencement of the 18th century, was parish clerk at Fort St. George from 1717 to '19, and was buried there on the 26th of October of the latter year. He left descendants, for an account of whom see an article, by Sir James Mackintosh, in the Edinburgh Review, xxv. 493–494.

The best portrait of Milton is said to be that drawn and engraved by Faithorne, prefixed to Milton's History of Britain, 1670, 4to. See Allan Cunningham's note to Johnson's Life of Milton in Cunningham's ed. of Johnson's Poets, 1854, i. 131. Mr. Cunningham does not value the miniature attributed to Cooper so highly as Sir Walter Scott: see Lockhart's Life of Scott, Abbotsford ed., 1850, 638.

I. Editions of Milton's Works, and Notices of his Biographers and Commentators.

Under this head we do not profess, of course, to present a complete catalogue raisonné of editions, editors, and commentators. Our limits oblige us to be content with the enumeration in each department of such as may justly claim precedence. Those who seek for additional particulars must refer to Todd's Life of Milton; Watt's Bibl. Brit.; Lon. Retrospec. Rev., 1825, xiv. 282–305; Lowndes's Bibl. Man.; Keightley's Life, Opinions, and Writings of Milton; and other authorities referred to under the 5th division (Miltoniana) of this portion of our article. Milton's Biographers are John Aubrey, in his MSS. collections pub. by Wood, &c.; Edward Phillips, (the poet's youngest nephew,) prefixed to Milton's Latin Epistles, 1694; John Nicholls, prefixed to his ed. of Milton's Letters of State, 1649–59, Lon., 1694, 8vo; John Toland, prefixed to Milton's Prose Works, 1698, fol.; Elijah Fenton, prefixed to Milton's Poems, 1725; Jonathan Richardson and his son, prefixed to their Explanatory Notes and Remarks on Milton's Paradise Lost, 1734; Thomas Birch, D.D., prefixed to Milton's Prose Works, 1738; Francis Peck, in his Memoirs of John Milton and Oliver Cromwell, 1740, 2 vols. 4to, and in his New Memoirs of the Life and Poetical Works of Mr. John Milton, 1740, 4to; Bishop Newton, prefixed to Paradise Lost, 1749; John Phillips, prefixed to Poems Attempted in the Style of Milton, 1762, 12mo; Dr. Johnson, Lives of the most Eminent English Poets, 1779; Henry Warton, D D., prefixed to Milton's Minor Poems, 1791; William Hayley, prefixed to Boydell's ed. of Milton's Poetical Works, 1794–97, 3 vols. fol.; Rev. To this list might be added the biographical sketches of Ellwood, Fenton, Ivimey, Sir S. E. Brydges, James Montgomery, R. W. Griswold, J. A. St. John, C. R. Edmonds, Prendeville, C. D. Cleveland, &c., and many valuable papers in periodicals, for a notice of which see Miltoniana, (post.)

Of the Editions of Milton's Works we notice (1) Works, Historical, Political, and Miscellaneous; with Life by John Toland, Amsterdam, 1697–98, 3 vols. fol. Collected by John Toland: very incorrect. Toland possessed peculiar advantages for his task.

"I heard some particulars," he says, "from a person that had once been his amanuensis, which were confirmed to me by his daughter, now dwelling in London, and by a letter written to me, at my desire, by his last wife, who is still alive. I perused the papers of one of his nephews, learned what I could in discourse with the other, and lastly consulted such of his acquaintance as, after the best inquiry, I was able to discover."

"It may surprise one after this," remarks Mr. Keightley, "to find the life so meagre as it is; but the truth is, biography is an art, and those who do not possess it are unable to make a proper use of the materials which may be at their disposal."—Keightley's Life, &c. of Milton, 115.

2. Prose Works, with Birch's Life, Lon., 1738, 2 vols. fol.: very incorrect. 3. Prose Works, with Birch's Life, 1753, 2 vols. 4to: very correct; proofs read by Richard Baron. 4. Prose Works, interspersed with Translations and Critical Remarks, with Symmons's Life, 1806, 7 vols. 8vo.

"Dr. Symmons has the advantage of admiring his subject to idolatry; but his style is pitiable,—feeble, inflated, aiming at that of Johnson, and, succeeding as he who stuffs himself as large as Falstaff, makes himself a prince of wits."—Robert Southey: Lon. Quar. Rev., xxxvi. 42, July, 1827.

"A scarecrow to admonish others of the folly of similar depredations."—Wm. H. Prescott, the historian: N. Amer. Rev., xlix. 334.

"The impetuous and violent Symmons."—Keightley's Life, Opinions, and Writings of Milton, 115.

As we have already bestowed our compliments on the modest Dr. Symmons in our life of John Aubrey, p. 82 of this Dictionary, we shall not pause to pay our respects to him here. See his ed. of Milton's Life, with Appendix of Papers, 1822, 8vo. 5. Prose Works, edited, with Introduction, by Robert Fletcher, 1826, imp. 8vo; 1832, imp. 8vo; with Poetical Works, 1838, imp. 8vo. 6. Prose Works, edited, with a Critical Memoir, by Rufus W. Griswold, D.D., Phila., 1845, 2 vols. 8vo: only American edition. 7. Prose Works, Bohn's Standard Library, Lon., 5 vols. p. 8vo,—viz.: i., ii., iii., 1848, edited by J. A. St. John; iv., v., 1853, (Christian Doctrine,) trans. and edited by Bishop Sumner. 8. Comus; a Masque, 1637, 4to; first ed. 9. English and Latin Poems, 1645, sm. 8vo; first ed., rare: sold at Sotheby's, Feb. 21, 1854, £6 6s. In this collection of his juvenile poems were first printed L'Allegro and Il Penseroso. The collection was reprinted, with additions to the English and Latin Poems, and the Tractate on Education, and the omission of the Epistle from Sir Henry Wotton, in 1673, sm. 8vo. 10. Poetical Works, with Notes of Various Authors, and Life by Bishop Thomas Newton, 1749–52, 3 vols. 4to.

"Bishop Newton's edition of Milton is the best-edited English classic up to the period of its publication."—Dibdin's Lib. Comp., 716.

11. Poetical Works, Edin., 1762, 2 vols. 8vo. 12. Poetical Works, Birmingham, 1759, 2 vols. 4to. Of this beautiful edition—known as Baskerville's—Joseph Hasiewood possessed a splendid copy, illustrated by his own hands. It contained an extraordinary collection of upwards of thirty different portraits of the poet, with portraits of his contemporaries and persons mentioned in his works, and many scarce and curious engravings by old artists; inserted likewise are the Original Proposals for printing the work, Advertisements, and a Life of Milton, printed by the Duke of Gordon at the private press at Gordon Castle. 13. Poetical Works, Edin., 1762, 2 vols. 8vo. 14. Poetical Works, with Life of the Author by Wm. Hayley, 1794–95–97, 3 vols. fol., £15 15s.,—Boydell's ed., thought by some to be the finest production of Bulmer's press.

"This magnificent edition does honour to the taste and abilities of those who were engaged in the production of it. It is a monument, indeed, worthy of him whose works entitle him to that supereminence among the poets of his country which he so happily assigned to his own glorious 'isle' among the 'sea-girt' domains of Neptune, in his Comus, v. 28,—'The greatest and the best of all the main.'"—HENRY J. TODD, D.D.

"The tame and supercelegant Hayley."—Keightley's Life of Milton, 116.

15. Poetical Works, with Notes of Various Authors, and Life by H. J. Todd, D.D., 1801, 6 vols. 8vo; 2d ed., 1809, 7 vols. 8vo; 3d ed., 1826, 7 vols. 8vo; 4th ed., 1842, 4 vols. 8vo; 5th ed., 1852, 4 vols. 8vo. Todd's Verbal Index to Milton's Poetical Works has been thoroughly revised and corrected by Professor Charles D. Cleveland, (post.)

"A life of Milton is yet [1827] a desideratum in our literature. . . The new Life by Mr. Todd will not supply the defect of which we have spoken. It disarms criticism by its perfect modesty and absence of pretension; but it has more the air of a legal instrument than of a poetical memoir. . . . Mr. Todd is no doubt a laborious man; but he is miserably out of his vocation as an editor of our poets."—ROBERT SOUTHEY: Lon. Quar. Rev., xxxvi. 43.

"The dry and ponderous Todd. . . . We trust we shall be excused when we say that, in our opinion, Todd's Life of Milton is the very BEAU IDEAL of bad biography."—Keightley's Life, &c. of Milton, 115, and n.

"Mr. Todd's work is a most admirable one, both in the biographical part of it and where he appears in the character of editor and annotator."—Hunter's Tract on Milton, 36, n.

"As to the critical and useful editions of our bard, what has been said of Mr. Todd's Spenser ["a justly-lauded edition"] may be said of his Milton. . . . With an incomparable index of words,—applicable to any edition. I consider a LARGE-PAPER copy of this performance as an indispensable ornament to a noble library."—Dibdin's Lib. Comp., 1825, 712.

16. Poetical Works, with Notes of Various Authors, and Bishop Thomas Newton's Life of Milton, edited by Rev. E. Hawkins, 1824, Oxf., 4 vols. 8vo.

"The life of our poet [in this edition] is, very judiciously, that of Bishop Newton. . . . I scarcely know a more useful and judicious impression of the poetry of Milton; and I give it (from the experience of a careful perusal) a warm and a general recommendation."—Dibdin's Lib. Comp., 716.

17. Poetical Works, with a Memoir and Notes by Rev. John Mitford, Lon., 1831, 3 vols. 12mo; new ed., 1852, 2 vols. 8vo. See No. 65.

"An excellent edition, . . . the first volume of which is taken up by his life, written with that taste and discrimination so characteristic of the author, to whom English literature is under lasting obligations."—C. D. CLEVELAND: Compend. of Eng. Lit.: Milton, 240, n.

19. Poetical Works, with Notes and Life by Rev. Henry Stebbing, and Dr. W. E. Channing's Essay on the Poetical Genius of Milton, 1841, 18mo; 1846, fp. 8vo. 20. Poetical Works, with a Life of the Author, Preliminary Dissertations on each Poem, Notes Critical and Explanatory, an Index to the Subjects of Paradise Lost, and a Verbal Index to all his Poems, edited by Charles Dexter Cleveland, Phila., 1853, 12mo; 2d ed., 1854, 12mo. This admirable edition has been already noticed in the article devoted to the gentleman to whose editorial labours the admirers of Milton are so largely indebted. Within the last few months has been published A Complete Concordance to the Poetical Works of Milton, by Guy Lushington Prendergast, Lon., 1857, 4to, pp. 416, double columns. This is compiled from the edition edited by Sir S. E. Brydges, 1835, 6 vols. 12mo.

"Mr. Prendergast, in preparing this 'Concordance' for the use of literary students, has performed a very meritorious labour, for which we think he will feel rewarded when it takes its place among the standard manuals of English literature, a book not to be superseded."—Lon. Athen., 1857, 1267.

24. Paradise Lost, 1667, 4to, pp. 342; first ed. and in Ten Books. To this ed. there are five different title-pages: the second and third are dated 1668, and the fourth and fifth 1669. "It appears to us that Mr. Martin has not of late been fortunate in his choice of subjects. He should never have attempted to illustrate Paradise Lost. "Paradise Lost is a poem which a painter can scarcely touch. A living artist of considerable talent has been trying of late to illustrate it throughout, and the results are deplorable: we doubt if they would have been much better had Martin been a Michael Angelo."—ROBERT SOUTHEY: Lon. Quar. Rev., xxxvi. 51, June, 1827.

Mr. Southey adds, in a note,

"We are not so absurd as to think that the 'Paradise Lost' contains no passages which might inspire a true painter. Satan calling on his host to arise, by the present President of the Royal Academy, is one proof to the contrary,—a noble picture,—almost as much superior, we imagine, to any historical piece of any other living artist as Sir Thomas Lawrence's portraits are above contemporary rivalry."

"Martin, the greatest, the most lofty, the most permanent, the most original, genius of his age. He is more original, more self-dependent, than Raffaelle or Michael Angelo: they perfected the style of others; Martin borrowed from none."—SIR E. L. BULWER LYTTON.

"The illustrations of Milton added to his reputation: upon these, we think, and the engravings from his paintings, his fame rests."—Lon. Art Journal: Biography of Martin.

"The Appendix of Notes is, however, that which many will think the most valuable recommendation of this edition. Mr. Prendeville has collected and condensed all the notes of all the commentators, and all the various readings, adding some of his own, not inferior, either in learning or in critical acuteness and depth, to those of any of his predecessors. The Appendix is a treasury of erudition. On the whole, this cheap edition of the 'Paradise Lost' is, in our judgment, the best edition of the poem, and one of the most useful books in every way, that we have ever seen."—*Lon. II. Critical Opinions on Milton's Principal Works.

1. Milton the Poet. Paradise Lost.

As early as 1639, Milton, in his verses to Manso, Marquis of Villa, intimates his intention of writing a poem of no ordinary pretensions:

"O mihi si mea sors talem concedat amicum,
Phœbæos decorasse viros qui tam bene norit,
Siquando indigenos revocabo in carmina reges,
Arturumque etiam sub terris bella moventem!
Aut dicam invictæ sociali fœdere mensæ
Magnanimos heroas: et, o modo spiritus adsit,
Frangam saxonicas Britonum sub Marte phalanges," &c.

Arthur, the British prince, is again referred to as his hero in some lines in the Epitaphium Damonis, written not long after his return from England:

"Ipse ego Dardanias Rutupina per æquora puppes
Dicam, et Pandrasidos regnum vetus Inogeniæ,
Brennumque Arviragumque duces, priscumque Belinum,
Et tandem Armoricos Britonum sub lege colonis;
Tum gravidam Arturo, fatali fraude, Iogernen,
Mendaces vultus, assumptaque Garlois arma,
Merlini dolus."

Vide Keightley's Life, &c. of Milton, 397–402.

"It may be doubted whether he would have succeeded on such a topic. His austere character would seem to have been better fitted to feel the impulses of religious enthusiasm than those of chivalry; and England has no reason to regret that her most sublime poet was reserved for the age of Cromwell instead of the romantic reign of Elizabeth."—Wm. H. Prescott: Miscellanies, 1855, 415, n.

In his Reason of Church Government urged against Prelaty, pub. in 1641, he speaks of "An inward prompting which now grew daily upon me, that by labour and intent study,—which I take to be my portion in this life,—joined to the strong propensity of nature, I might perhaps leave something so written to after-times as they should not willingly let it die."

For the consummation of this laudable project he relies principally upon

"Devout prayer to that Eternal Spirit who can enrich with all utterance and knowledge, and sends out his seraphim with the hallowed fire of his altar to touch and purify the lips of whom he pleases."

"From a promise like this," remarks Dr. Johnson, "at once fervid, pious, and rational, might be expected the 'Paradise Lost.'"—Life of Milton.

Aubrey says that he commenced Paradise Lost in 1658; but doubtless he had carefully revolved the subject in his mind long before that date. We are told that it was ready for the press in 1665, two years before its publication. It was sold to Simmons, the bookseller, for £5 in hand, £5 more on the sale of 1300 copies of the first edition, £5 more on the sale of 1300 copies of the second edition, and £5 more after the sale of 1300 copies of the third edition no edition to exceed 1500 copies.

After the publication of the third edition, in 1678, Mrs. Milton transferred all her right in the work (April 29, 1681) for £8.

"So that," says Hayley, "twenty-eight pounds, at different times in the course of thirteen years, is the whole pecuniary reward which this great performance produced to the poet and his widow."

Simmons sold out to Brabazon Aylmer for £25, and he disposed of his interest to Jacob Tonson—one-half of it August 17, 1683, and the other half March 24, 1690—for a large advance. It would be difficult to compute how many hundreds of thousands of pounds sterling have been paid for Paradise Lost, in Great Britain and America, in the one hundred and ninety years which have elapsed (we write in January, 1858) since its first publication. Pickering sold the agreement to Sir Thomas Lawrence for £60; he repurchased it at the sale of Lawrence's library at Christie's, June, 1830, for £63, and resold it to Samuel Rogers for one hundred guineas. Moore remarks, in his Diary, October 21, 1826,

"Called at Pickering's, in Chancery Lane, who showed us the original agreement between Milton and Symonds for the payment of five pounds for 'Paradise Lost.' The contrast of this sum with the £2000 given for [the unexpired term of the copyright of] Mrs. Rundell's 'Cookery' comprises a history in itself. Pickering, too, gave forty-five guineas for this whole agreement,—three times as much as the sum given for the poem. It was part payment, I think.(?)"—Moore's Memoirs, &c., 1853, 119.

There has been much said respecting the alleged slow sale of Paradise Lost for some time after its first publication. Let us look into this matter a little.

"It must be acknowledged," says Sir Richard Blackmore, "that till about forty years ago [he writes in 1716] Great Britain was barren of critical learning, though fertile in excellent writers, and in particular had so little taste for epic poetry, and was so unacquainted with the essential properties and peculiar beauties of it, that 'Paradise Lost'—an admirable work of that kind, published by Mr Milton, the great ornament of his age and country—lay many years unspoken of and entirely disregarded, till at length it happened that some persons of greater delicacy and judgment found out the merit of that excellent poem, and, by communicating their sentiments to their friends, propagated the esteem of the author, who soon acquired universal applause."—Blackmore's Essays, 1716, 2 vols. 8vo.

"Never any poet," writes Dennis,—we are following the order in which Mr. Peter Cunningham has arranged these quotations, (Johnson's Lives of the Poets, i. 124–126,)—"left a greater reputation behind him than Mr. Cowley; while Milton remained obscure and known but to few."—Dennis's Letters, 1721, 8vo, 174, 207.

The same writer remarks, in another place,

"'Paradise Lost' had been printed forty years before it was known to the greatest part of England that there barely was such a book."

"When Milton first published his famous poem, the first edition was long going off: few either read, liked, or understood it; and it gained ground merely by its merit."—Swift's Letter to Sir Charles Wogan.

"We know what reception 'Paradise Lost' met with in the author's lifetime."—Barton Booth's Letter to Aaron Hill.

"'Tis well known that Milton went off at first very slowly."—Dr. Arbuthnot: Works, i. 110.

"It was your lordship's encouraging a beautiful edition of 'Paradise Lost' that first brought that incomparable poem to be generally known and esteemed."—Hughes to Lord Somers: Spenser's Works, 1715, 12mo: Dedication. Vide No. 50, supra.

"When Paradise Lost was published it was valued but by few, as no more than a lifeless piece, till Mr. Marvell and Dr. Barrow publickly espoused it, each in a judicious poem."—Cooke's Life of Marvell, 1726.

"It is well known that Milton never enjoyed in his lifetime the reputation which he deserved. His Paradise Lost was long neglected: prejudices against an apologist for the regicides, and against a work not wholly purged from the cant of former times, kept the ignorant world from perceiving the prodigious merit of that performance. Lord Somers, by encouraging a good edition of it about twenty years after the author's death, first brought it into request; and Tonson, in his dedication of a smaller edition, speaks of it as a work just beginning to be known. Even during the prevalence of Milton's party he seems never to have been much regarded. And Whitlocke talks of one Milton, as he calls him, a blind man, who was employed in translating a treaty with Sweden into Latin. These forms of expression are amusing to posterity, who consider how obscure Whitlocke himself—though Lord-Keeper and ambassador, and, indeed, a man of great abilities and merit—has become in comparison of Milton."—Hume's Hist. of Eng., Bowyers's ed., 1806, iv. 666–667.

Sir Walter Scott, referring to the public neglect of Southey's Madoc, remarks,

"We know the similar fate of Milton's immortal work at a time when poetry was much more fashionable than at present."—Letter to Miss Seward: Scott's Life.

Sir Walter considers that this coldness is "Traceable to the character of its author, so obnoxious for his share in the government of Cromwell; to the turn of the language, so different from that of the age; and to the seriousness of a subject so discordant with its lively frivolities."—Scott's Miscell. Prose Works.

Mr. Southey also remarks,

"The fact is, that the estimation in which Milton is now held disables us from judging calmly of the rank in which he stood with his cotemporaries. Many years after the publication of the delightful poems of his youth, he speaks of himself to Salmasius as of a person but little known, (v. ii. 381.) Waller—not Milton—was long reckoned the 'Virgil of the nation.'"—Lon. Quar. Rev., xxxvi. 41.

The mention of Waller will doubtless remind some of our readers of his contemptuous allusion to Paradise Lost, which we shall presently have occasion to quote.

But is it quite certain that Paradise Lost was so greatly neglected by the generation which witnessed its birth? Let us hear something on the other side:

"The sale of thirteen hundred copies in two years, in opposition to so much recent enmity, and to a style of versification new to all and disgusting to many, was an uncommon example of the prevalence of genius. The demand did not immediately increase; for many more readers than were supplied at first the nation did not afford. Only three thousand were sold in eleven years; for it forced its way without assistance, its admirers did not dare to publish their opinion, and the opportunities now given of attracting attention by advertisements were then very few: the means of proclaiming the publication of new books have been produced by that general literature which now pervades the nation through all its ranks."—Dr. Johnson: Lives of the Poets, Cunningham's ed., i. 124. And see Mr. Cunningham's note.

Mr. Hallam, commenting on the above, remarks,

"It would hardly, however, be said, even in this age, of a poem 3000 copies of which had been sold in eleven years, that its success had been small; and some, perhaps, might doubt whether Paradise Lost published eleven years since would have met with a greater demand. There is sometimes a want of congeniality in public taste which no power of genius will overcome. For Milton it must be said by every one conversant with the literature of the age that preceded Addison's famous criticism, from which some have dated the reputation of Paradise Lost, that he took his place among great poets from the beginning."—Lit. Hist. of Europe, 4th ed., 1854, iii. 480.

"Milton's politics kept him down; but the epigram of Dryden, and the very sale of his work in proportion to the less reading time of its publication, prove him to have been honoured by his contemporaries. I will venture to assert that the sale of the Paradise Lost was greater in the first four years after its publication than that of 'The Excursion' [of Wordsworth] in the same number, with the difference of nearly a century and a half between them of time and of thousands in point of general readers."—Lord Byron: Pamphlet in answer to Blackw. Mag., (unpublished.) See Moore's Life of Byron, vol. ii.

"Milton's poetical writings do not seem to have been held in that neglect by his contemporaries which is commonly supposed. He had attracted too much attention as a political controversialist, was too much feared for his talents as well as hated for his principles, to allow any thing which fell from his pen to pass unnoticed."—Wm. H. Prescott, the historian: Miscellanies, 1855, 276, from N. Amer. Rev., xlix. 337.

"When Paradise Lost first appeared it was not neglected."—Campbell's Specimens of the British Poets.

"The strange misrepresentations long prevalent among ourselves respecting the slow progress of Milton's reputation, sanctioned as they were both by Johnson and by Thomas Warton, have produced ridiculous effects abroad. On the 10th of November, 1814, a Parisian poet, named Campenon, was, in the present unhappy state of French literature, received at the Academy as the successor of the Abbé Delille. In his Discours de Réception he speaks of the abbé's translation 'de ce Paradis Perdu, dont l'Angleterre est si fière depuis qu'elle a cessé d'en ignorer le mérite.' The President, M. Regnault de St. Jean d'Angeley, said that M. Delille repaid our hospitality by translating Milton,—'en doublant ainsi la célébrité du Poëte dont le génie a inspiré à l'Angleterre un si tardif mais si légitime orgueil.'"—Sir James Mackintosh: Miscell., 1854, ii. 501, n.; from Edin. Rev., xxv. 495.

There can be no better opportunity to quote some of the early criticisms on Paradise Lost:

"The old blind schoolmaster, John Milton, hath published a tedious poem on the Fall of Man: if its length be not considered a merit, it hath no other."—Waller.

"That 'Paradise Lost' of Milton, which some are pleased to call a poem."—Rymer: Letter to Fleetwood Shepherd on the Tragedies of the Last Age, 1678, 143.

"A rough, unhewn fellow, that a man must sweat to read him."—Prior and Montague: The Hind and the Panther Transversed, &c., 1687.

Bayes remarks, "after quoting a liquid line,"

"I writ this line for the ladies: I hate such a rough, unhewn fellow as Milton."

"Rymer," says Mr. Cunningham, "expressed the general feeling of his age; for Milton himself, says Edmund Smith, (account of John Phillips,) has been compared, in a very polite court, to the rumbling of a wheelbarrow."—Johnson's Lives of the English Poets, 1854, i. 125, n.

Sir William Temple, in his catalogue of writers who have adorned modern literature, takes no notice of Milton. The Duke of Buckingham and Lord Rochester, the Earl of Clarendon and Richard Baxter, are equally silent. We next quote a verdict of Dryden. The Earl of Dorset being one day in Simmons's book-store, the latter handed him a copy of Paradise Lost, begged him to read it and send him purchasers for it. His lordship perused it himself, and then lent it to Dryden, who returned it with these words: "This man will cut us all out, and the ancients too."

In the next year after the death of Milton, Dryden calls Paradise Lost "one of the greatest, most noble, and most sublime poems which either the age or nation has produced;" and he puts Milton on the same footing with Homer, Virgil, and Tasso. (Prose Works, by Malone, ii. 397, 403.)

The following lines of Dryden's are familiar to many of our readers:

> "Three poets, in three distant ages born,
> Greece, Italy, and England did adorn:
> The first in loftiness of thought surpass'd;
> The next in majesty; in both the last.
> The force of Nature could no further go:
> To make a third, she join'd the other two."

"His thoughts are elevated," again says Dryden, "his words sounding, and no man has so happily copied the manner of Homer, or so copiously translated his Grecisms, and the Latin elegancies of Virgil."—Ded. of Juvenal, 1693.

His praise is not without qualifications:

"It is true he runs into a flat of thought sometimes for a hundred lines together; but it is when he has got into a track of Scripture."—Ibid.

"Milton's 'Paradise Lost' is admirable; but am I therefore bound to maintain that there are no flats among his elevations, when it is evident he creeps along sometimes for above a hundred lines together?"—Pref. to Second Miscellany, 1685.

In Aubrey's Lives we find this passage:

"Jo. Dreyden, Esq., Poet-Laureate, who very much admired him, and went for him to have leave to putt his Paradise Lost into a drama in rhymes. Mr. Milton received him civilly, and told him he would give him leave to tagg his verses."—iii. 444.

"The imitators of Milton," says Pope, "like most other imitators, are not copies, but caricatures, of their original: they are a hundred times more obsolete and cramp than he, and equally so in all places; whereas it should have been observed of Milton that he is not lavish of his exotic words and phrases everywhere alike, but employs them much more where the subject is marvellous, vast, and strange,—as in the scenes of heaven, hell, chaos, &c.,—than where it is turned to the natural and agreeable,—as in the pictures of Paradise, the loves of our first parents, the entertainments of angels, and the like. In general, this unusual style better serves to awaken our ideas in the descriptions and in the imaging and picturesque parts than it agrees with the lower sort of narrations, the character of which is simplicity and purity. Milton has several of the latter, where we find not an antiquated, affected, or uncouth word for some hundred lines together,—as in his fifth book, the latter part of the eighth, the former of the tenth and eleventh books, and in the narration of Michael in the twelfth. I wonder, indeed, that he who ventured (contrary to the practice of all other epic poets) to imitate Homer's lownesses in the narrative should not also have copied his plainness and perspicuity in the dramatic parts, since in his speeches (where clearness above all is necessary) there is frequently such transposition and forced construction that the very sense is not to be discovered without a second or third reading; and in this certainly he ought to be no example."—Postscript to the Odyssey.

Pope also complains of the occasional "creeping" referred to by Dryden:

> "Milton's strong pinions now not heaven can bound,
> Now, serpent-like, in prose he sweeps the ground;
> In quibbles angel and archangel join,
> And God the Father turns a school divine."
> To Augustus.

We regret that we cannot find room for the whole of Andrew Marvell's exquisite poem on Paradise Lost:

> "When I beheld the poet blind, yet bold,
> In slender book his vast design unfold,
> Messiah crown'd, God's reconciled decree,
> Rebelling angels, the forbidden tree,
> Heav'n, hell, earth, chaos, all,—the argument

"As for Mr. Milton, whom we all admire with so much justice," says Dryden, "his subject is not that of a heroic poem, properly so called. His design is the losing of our happiness; his event is not prosperous, like that of all other epic works; his heavenly machines are many, and his human persons are but two."—Ded. of Juvenal, 1693.

An excellent analysis of the difficulties which Milton had to overcome in the management of his exalted subject, and of his success in his great undertaking, will be found in Masson's Essays, Biographical and Critical, 1856, 57, et seq.

"Virgil," says Sir Archibald Alison, "produces one uniform impression from the homely details of his Georgics equally as the complicated events of the Æneid. Amidst an infinity of details and episodes, Tasso has, with consummate skill, preserved unity of emotion in his Jerusalem Delivered. Milton has not lost it even in recording the events of heaven and earth."—Essays, Polit., Histor., and Miscell., 1850, iii. 427.

Much has been written respecting the versification of Paradise Lost:

"Neither will I justify Milton," says Dryden, "for his blank verse, though I may excuse him by the example of Hannibal Caro and other Italians who have used it; for, whatever causes he alleges for the abolishing of rhyme, (which I have not now the leisure to examine,) his own particular reason is plainly this,—that rhyme was not his talent: he has neither the ease of doing it nor the graces of it,—which is manifest in his Juvenilia, or verses written in his youth, where the rhyme is always constrained and forced, and comes hardly from him, at an age when the soul is most pliant and the passion of love makes almost every man a rhymer though not a poet."—Ded. of Juvenal, 1693.

Johnson's comments on this subject are familiar to the reader: he concludes with

"But, whatever may be the advantage of rhyme, I cannot prevail on myself to wish that Milton had been a rhymer; for I cannot wish his work to be other than it is. Yet, like other heroes, he is to be admired rather than imitated. He that thinks himself capable of astonishing may write blank verse; but those that hope only to please must condescend to rhyme."—Life of Milton.

We subjoin two comments on this dictum:

"I am aware that Johnson has said, after some hesitation, that he could not 'prevail upon himself to wish that Milton had been a rhymer.' The opinions of that truly great man—whom it is also the present fashion to decry—will ever be received by me with that deference which time will restore to him from all; but, with all humility, I am not persuaded that the Paradise Lost would not have been more nobly conveyed to posterity, not, perhaps, in heroic couplets,—although even they could sustain the subject if well balanced,—but in the stanza of Spenser or of Tasso, or in the Terza rima of Dante, which the powers of Milton could easily have grafted on our language."—LORD BYRON: Pamphlet, &c. in Moore's Life of Byron, vol. ii.

"Was there ever any thing so delightful as the music of the 'Paradise Lost'? It is like that of a fine organ; has the fullest and the deepest tones of majesty, with all the softness and elegance of the Dorian flute; variety without end, and never equalled, unless, perhaps, by Virgil. Yet the doctor has little or nothing to say upon this copious theme, but talks something about the unfitness of the English language for blank verse, and how apt it is, in the mouth of some readers, to degenerate into declamation. Oh, I could thresh his old jacket till I made his pension jingle in his pocket."—Cowper to Unwin, Oct. 31, 1779.

"The practice of cutting short a The is warranted by Milton, who, of all English poets that ever lived, had certainly the finest ear."—Cowper to Lady Hesketh, March 6, 1786.

"To begin with the least of Milton's merits, what author ever knew how to

> 'untwist all the links that tie
> The hidden soul of Harmony'

as he did? Whence came his knowledge? What rules or system did he proceed upon in building up his magnificent stanza? And what has become of the discovery which he made?—for assuredly it has not been preserved by his successors. There is no blank verse worthy of the name—real verse, not measured prose, but the legitimate medium for the expression of the thoughts and feelings of poetry—beyond the volumes of Milton."—Henry Neele's Lects. on Eng. Poetry, Lect. II.

"The blank metre of Paradise Lost is more various, more rich in the melody of cadences, than that of any other English poem. This, perhaps, is owing to a circumstance not generally observed,—that Milton is almost the only writer in blank verse who had previously made himself a perfect master of rhyme and the rhyming measures."—REV. H. STEBBING: Memoir of Milton.

"Milton's blank verse is the only blank verse in the language (except Shakspeare's) that deserves the name of verse. Dr. Johnson, who had modelled his ideas of versification on the regular sing-song of Pope, condemns the Paradise Lost as harsh and unequal. I shall not pretend to say that this is not sometimes the case; for where a degree of excellence beyond the mechanical rules of art is attempted the poet must sometimes fail. But I imagine that there are more perfect examples in Milton of musical expression, or of an adaptation of the sound and movement of the verse to the meaning of the passage, than in all our other writers, whether of rhyme or blank verse put together, (with the exception already mentioned.) . . . Milton has himself given us the theory of his versification:

> 'Such as the meeting soul may pierce,
> In notes with many a winding bout
> Of linked sweetness long drawn out.'

Dr. Johnson and Pope would have converted his vaulting Pegasus into a rocking-horse. Read any other blank verse but Milton's,—Thomson's, Young's, Cowper's, Wordsworth's,—and it will be found, from the want of the same insight into the hidden soul of harmony, to be mere lumbering prose."—Hazlitt's Lects. on the Eng. Poets, Lect. III.

"In our English heroic verse, such as Milton has composed it, there is much greater variety of feet, of movement, of musical notes and bars, than in the Greek heroic; and the final sounds are incomparably more diversified."—W. S. LANDOR.

"The boldness, freedom, and variety of our blank verse is infinitely more favourable than rhyme to all kinds of sublime poetry. The fullest proof of this is afforded by Milton, an author whose genius led him eminently to the sublime. The whole first and second books of Paradise Lost are continued instances of it."—Blair's Lects. on Rhetoric and Belles-Lettres, Lect. IV.: Sublimity in Writing.

"The language and versification of the 'Paradise Lost' are peculiar in being so much more necessarily correspondent to each other than those in any other poem or poet. The connexion of the sentences and the position of the words are exquisitely artificial; but the position is rather according to the logic of passion or universal logic than to the logic of grammar. Milton attempted to make the English language obey the logic of passion as perfectly as the Greek and Latin: hence the occasional harshness in the construction."—COLERIDGE: Lect. X.

> "The noble hater of degenerate rhyme
> Shook off the chains, and built his verse sublime
> A monument too high for coupled souls to climb."
> Watts's Lyrics.

"We should not fulfil our duty were we not to say one word on what has been justly celebrated,—the harmony of Milton's versification. His numbers have the prime charm of expressiveness. They vary with, and answer to, the depth, or tenderness, or sublimity of his conceptions, and hold intimate alliance with the soul. Like Michael Angelo, in whose hands the marble was said to be flexible, he bends our language—which foreigners reproach with hardness—into whatever form the subject demands. All the treasures of sweet and solemn sound are at his command. Words harsh and discordant in the writings of less gifted men flow through his poetry in a full stream of harmony. This power over language is not to be ascribed to Milton's musical ear. It belongs to the soul. It is a gift or exercise of genius, which has power to impress itself on whatever it touches, and finds or frames in sounds, motions, and material forms, correspondencies and harmonies with its own fervid thoughts and feelings."—W. E. CHANNING, D.D.: Essay on the Poetical Genius of Milton.

Marvell defends Milton in the use of rhyme:

> "Well might thou scorn thy readers to allure
> With tinkling rhyme, of thy own sense secure;
> While the Town-Bays writes all the while and spells,
> And, like a pack-horse, tires without his bells
> Their fancies like our bushy points appear:
> The poets tag them; we for fashion wear.
> I too, transported by the mode, offend,
> And, while I mean to praise thee, must commend.
> Thy verse, created like thy theme sublime
> In number, weight, and measure, needs not rhyme."
> Poem on Paradise Lost

But it is certain that many of Milton's contemporaries were dissatisfied with the measure of his poem; and the publisher was sufficiently annoyed by the complaints carried to his shop by the malcontents to beg the author to teach him how to defend himself. To the third title-page, 1688, of the first edition, we find the following preface:

"THE PRINTER TO THE READER.

"Courteous Reader: There was no Argument at first intended to the Book; but, for the satisfaction of many that have desired it, I have procur'd it, and withall a Reason of that which stumbleth many others, why the Poem Rimes not.

"S. SIMMONS."

Then follows Milton's own defence,—not signed by him, however:

"THE VERSE.

"The measure is English Heroic Verse, without Rime, as that of Homer in Greek, and of Virgil in Latin; Rime being no necessary Adjunct or true Ornament of Poem or good Verse, in longer Works especially, but the Invention of a barbarous Age to set off wretched Matter and lame Meeter: grac't indeed since by the use of some famous Modern Poets, carried away by Custom, but much to their own vexation, hindrance, and constraint, to express many things otherwise, and for the most part worse, then else they would have exprest them. Not without cause, therefore, some both Italian and Spanish Poets of prime note have rejected Rime both in longer and shorter Works, as have also, long since, our best English Tragedies; as a thing of itself, to all judicious eares, triveal and of no true musical delight,—which consists only in apt Numbers, fit quantity of Syllables, and the sense variously drawn out from one verse into another, not in the jingling sound of like endings, a fault avoided by the learned Ancients, both in Poetry and all good Oratory. This neglect then of Rimes so little is to be taken for a defect, though it may seem so perhaps to vulgar readers, that it rather is to be esteemed an example set, the first in English, of ancient liberty recover'd to Heroic Poem from the troublesom and modern bondage of Rimeing."

This is "carrying the war into Africa," and will remind the reader of a passage in the Preface to Johnson's Dictionary which we have quoted in our life of the lexicographer in the present volume. See p. 975, col. 1, line 4, et seq.

Whilst those greatly err who date the public admiration of Paradise Lost in the same year with the appearance of Addison's famous criticisms on the poem in The Spectator, it is not to be questioned that the enthusiastic yet discriminating eulogy of so distinguished a literary leader did much to increase the number of Milton's readers, and to secure him in that elevated position which not even hypercritical perversity nor a childish desire for the reputation of literary singularity is permitted to challenge. Nearly twenty years before Addison had composed the Essays to which we refer, and when, of course, he was little more than a youth, he drew up a poetical letter to Henry Sacheverell,—An Account of the Greatest English Poets,—in which he eulogizes Milton in the highest terms. For instance:

> "But Milton next, with high and haughty stalks,
> Unfettered in majestic numbers walks.
> No vulgar hero can his muse engage,
> Nor earth's wide scene confine his hallowed rage.
> See! see, he upward springs, and, towering high,
> Spurns the dull province of mortality,
> Shakes heaven's eternal throne with dire alarms,
> And sets the Almighty thunderer in arms.
> Whate'er his pen describes I more than see,
> Whilst every verse, arrayed in majesty,
> Bold and sublime, my whole attention draws,
> And seems above the critic's nicest laws," &c.

April 3, 1694: Addison's Works, H. G. Bohn's ed., 1854, i. 24.

Yet at a later date, when the youthful poet has been matured into the deliberative critic, he resolves to apply the canon of criticism to the great poem upon the altar of whose praise he had offered the first-fruits of his glowing admiration; and he thus announces his intention to the literary world:

"As the first place among our English poets is due to Milton, and as I have drawn more quotations out of him than from any other, I shall enter into a regular criticism upon his Paradise Lost, which I shall publish every Saturday till I have given my thoughts upon that poem."—Spectator, No. 262, Dec. 31, 1711.

The criticisms which follow occupy 18 numbers of The Spectator,—viz.: 267, 273, 279, 285, 291, 297, 303, 309, 315, 321, 327, 333, 339, 345, 351, 357, 363, 369; published January 5, 1711–12, to May 3, 1712.

Sir James Mackintosh, noticing "the strange misrepresentations long prevalent among ourselves respecting the slow progress of Milton's reputation," (ante,) remarks that

"By the language in which Addison announces his criticism—'As the first place among our English poets is due to Milton, I shall enter into a regular criticism upon his Paradise Lost,' &c.—it is clear that he takes for granted the paramount greatness of Milton, and that his object was not to disinter a poet who had been buried in unjust oblivion, but to illustrate the rules of criticism by observations on the writings of him whom all his readers revered as the greatest poet of their country."—Mackintosh's Miscell. Works, i. 500: from Edin. Rev., xxv. 494.

The reader will find Addison's elaborate criticism (of course, in any edition of The Spectator) in vol. iii. of Bohn's ed. of Addison's Works, with Bishop Hurd's Notes, 1854, pp. 176–283. We shall quote a few passages from these pages, which, we think, will tempt the admirer of Milton (and who is not proud of that title?) to peruse carefully the whole.

"If we look into the characters of Milton we shall find that he has introduced all the variety his fable was capable of receiving. The whole species of mankind was in two persons at the time to which the subject of his poem is confined. We have, however, four distinct characters in these two persons. We see man and woman in the highest innocence and perfection and in the most abject state of guilt and infirmity. The two last characters are, indeed, very common and obvious; but the two first are not only more magnificent, but more new, than any characters either in Virgil or Homer, or, indeed, in the whole circle of nature. [p. 182.]

"A Roman could not but rejoice in the escapes, successes, and victories of Æneas, and be grieved at any defeats, misfortunes, or disappointments that befell him; as a Greek must have had the same regard for Achilles. And it is plain that each of these poems have lost this great advantage among those readers to whom their heroes are as strangers or indifferent persons. Milton's poem is admirable in this respect, since it is impossible for any of its readers, whatever nation, country, or people he may belong to, not to be related to the persons who are the principal actors in it; but, what is still infinitely more to its advantage, the principal actors in this poem are not only our progenitors, but our representatives. We have an actual interest in every thing they do; and no less than our utmost happiness is concerned and lies at stake in their behaviour. [p. 184.]

"Virgil has excelled all others in the propriety of his sentiments. Milton shines likewise very much in this particular; nor must we omit one consideration which adds to his honour and reputation. Homer and Virgil introduced persons whose characters are commonly known among men, and such as are to be met with either in history or in ordinary conversation. Milton's characters, most of them, lie out of nature, and were to be formed purely by his own invention. . . . Adam and Eve before the Fall are a different species from that of mankind who are descended from them; and none but a poet of the most unbounded invention and the most exquisite judgment could have filled their conversation and behaviour with so many circumstances during their state of innocence. [p. 186.] Milton's chief talent, and, indeed, his distinguishing excellence, lies in the sublimity of his thoughts. There are others of the moderns who rival him in every other part of poetry; but in the greatness of his sentiments he triumphs over all the poets, both modern and ancient, Homer only excepted. [Homer only excepted. He might have said, with truth, "Homer himself not excepted."—BISHOP HURD.] It is impossible for the imagination of man to distend itself with greater ideas than those which he has laid together in his first, second, and sixth books. The seventh, which describes the creation of the world, is likewise wonderfully sublime, though not so apt to stir up emotion in the mind of the reader, nor, consequently, so perfectly in the epic way of writing, because it is filled with less action. Let the judicious reader compare what Longinus has observed on several passages in Homer, and he will find parallels for most of them in the Paradise Lost. [p. 187.] Sentiments which raise laughter can very seldom be admitted with any decency into an heroic poem, whose business it is to excite passions of a much nobler nature. . . . The only piece of pleasantry in Paradise Lost is where the evil spirits are described as rallying the angels upon the success of their newly-invented artillery. This passage I look upon to be the most exceptionable in the whole poem, as being nothing else but a string of puns, and those, too, very indifferent. [pp. 188, 189.] If clearness and perspicuity were only to be consulted, the poet would have nothing else to do but to clothe his thoughts in the most plain and natural expressions. But since it often happens that the most obvious phrases, and those which are used in ordinary conversation, become too familiar to the ear, and contract a kind of meanness by passing through the mouths of the vulgar, a poet should take particular care to guard himself against idiomatic modes of speaking. Ovid and Lucan have many poornesses of expression upon this account, as taking up with the first phrases that offered, without putting themselves to the trouble of looking after such as would not only be natural but also elevated and sublime. Milton has but a few failings in this kind, of which, however, you may meet with some instances, as in the following passages:

> 'Embryos and Idiots, Eremites and Friars,
> White, black, and grey, with all their trumpery,
> Here pilgrims roam.'
> 'A while discourse they hold,
> No fear lest dinner cool; when thus began
> Our author:'
> 'Who, of all ages to succeed, by feeling
> The evil on him brought by me, will curse
> My head. ill fare our ancestor impure,
> For this we may thank Adam.'

"The great masters in composition know very well that many an elegant phrase becomes improper for a poet or an orator when it has been debased by common use. . . . Aristotle has observed that the idiomatic style may be avoided, and the sublime formed, by the following methods. First, by the use of metaphors. such as those in Milton:

> 'Imparadised in one another's arms.'
> 'And in his hand a reed
> Stood waving, tipt with fire.'
> 'The grassy clods now calved.'
> 'Spangled with eyes.'

"In these and innumerable other instances the metaphors are very bold and just. I must, however, observe that the metaphors are not thick-sown in Milton,—which always savours too much of wit; that they never clash with another,—which, as Aristotle observes, turns a sentence into a kind of enigma or riddle; and that he seldom has recourse to them where the proper and natural words will do as well. Another way of raising the language and giving it a poetical turn is to make use of the idioms of other tongues. Virgil is full of the Greek forms of speech which the critics call Hellenisms, as Horace in his Odes abounds with them much more than Virgil. I need not mention the several dialects which Homer has made use of for this end. Milton, in conformity with the practice of the ancient poets, and with Aristotle's rule, has infused a great many Latinisms, as well as Græcisms, and sometimes Hebraisms, into the language of his poem. . . . I must likewise take notice that there are in Milton several words of his own coining, as Cerberean, miscreated, hell-doom'd, embryon atoms, and many others. If the reader is offended at this liberty in our English poet, I would recommend him to a discourse in Plutarch, which shows us how frequently Homer has made use of the same liberty.

"Milton, by the above-mentioned helps, and by the choice of the noblest words and phrases which our tongue would afford him, has carried our language to a greater height than any of the English poets have ever done before or after him, and made the sublimity of his style equal to that of his sentiments. . . . The redundancy of those several ways of speech which Aristotle calls foreign language, and with which Milton has so very much enriched, and in some places darkened, the language of his poem, was the more proper for his use because his poem is written in blank verse. . . . I shall close these reflections upon the language of Paradise Lost with observing that Milton has copied after Homer, rather than Virgil, in the length of his periods, the copiousness of his phrases, and the running of his verses into one another. [pp. 190, 191, 192, 193. 194.] Horace advises a poet to consider thoroughly the nature and force of his genius. Milton seems to have known perfectly well wherein his strength lay, and has therefore chosen a subject entirely conformable to those talents of which he was master. As his genius was wonderfully turned to the sublime, his subject is the noblest that could have entered into the thoughts of man. Every thing that is truly great and astonishing has a place in it. The whole system of the intellectual world, the chaos and the creation, heaven, earth, and hell, enter into the constitution of his poem. Having in the first and second books represented the infernal world with all its horrors, the thread of his fable naturally leads him into the opposite regions of bliss and glory. . . . He has represented all the abstruse doctrines of predestination, free will, and grace, as also the great points of the incarnation and redemption, (which naturally grow up in a poem that treats of the fall of man,) with great energy of expression, and in a clearer and stronger light than I ever met with in any other writer. As these points are dry in themselves to the generality of readers, the concise and clear manner in which he has treated them is very much to be admired, as is likewise that particular art which he made use of, in the interspersing of all those graces of poetry which the subject was capable of receiving. [pp. 217, 218.] Those who look into Homer are surprised to find his battles still rising one above another, and improving in horror, to the conclusion of the Iliad. Milton's fight of angels is wrought up with the same beauty. It required great pregnancy of invention and strength of imagination to fill this battle with such circumstances as should raise and astonish the mind of the reader, and at the same time an exactness of judgment to avoid every thing that might appear light or trivial. . . . There are, indeed, so many wonderful strokes of poetry in this book, [VI.,] and such a variety of sublime ideas, that it would have been impossible to have given them a place within the bounds of this paper. . . . There is no question but Milton had heated his imagination with the fight of the gods in Homer before he entered upon this engagement of the angels. . . . As Homer has introduced into his battle of the gods every thing that is great and terrible in nature, Milton has filled his fight of good and bad angels with all the like circumstances of horror. . . . In a word, Milton's genius, which was so great in itself, and so strengthened by all the helps of learning, appears in this book [VI.] every way equal to his subject, which was the most sublime that could enter into the thoughts of a poet. [pp. 238, 240, 242, 243.] One great genius often catches the flame from another, and writes in his spirit without copying servilely after him. There are a thousand shining passages in Virgil which have been lighted up by Homer. Milton, though his own natural strength of genius was capable of furnishing out a perfect work, has doubtless very much raised and ennobled his conceptions by such an imitation as that which Longinus has recommended. . . . The angel's encouraging our first parents in a modest pursuit after knowledge, with the causes which he assigns for the creation of the world, [Book VII.,] are very just and beautiful. . . . I do not know any thing in the whole poem more sublime than the description which follows, [Book VII.,] where the Messiah is represented at the head of his angels, as looking down into the chaos, calming its confusion, riding into the midst of it, and drawing the first outline of the creation:

'On heavenly ground they stood, and from the shore' [quotation concluding with the line
"This be thy just circumference, O world."]

'The thought of the golden compasses is conceived altogether in Raphael's spirit, and is a very noble incident in this wonderful description. . . . The beauties of description in this book [VII.] lie so very thick that it is impossible to enumerate them in this paper. The poet has employed on them the whole energy of our tongue. The several great scenes of the creation rise up to view one after another in such a manner, that the reader seems present at this wonderful work and to assist among the choirs of angels who are the spectators of it. How glorious is the conclusion of the first day! . . . We have the same elevation of thought in the third day, when the mountains were brought forth, and the deep was made. . . . We have also the rising of the whole vegetable world described in this day's work, which is filled with all the graces that other poets have lavished on their description of the spring, and leads the reader's imagination into a theatre equally surprising and beautiful. . . . The poet afterwards represents the Messiah returning into heaven and taking a survey of his great work. There is something inexpressibly sublime in this part of the poem, where the author describes that great period of time, filled with so many glorious circumstances, when the heavens and earth were finished, when the Messiah ascended up in triumph through the everlasting gates, when he looked down with pleasure upon his new creation, when every part of nature seemed to rejoice in its existence, when the morning stars sang together, and all the sons of God shouted for joy. [244, 245, 246, 247, 248.] Adam, to detain the angel, [Book VIII.,] enters afterwards upon his own history, and relates to him the circumstances in which he found himself upon his creation, as also his conversation with his Maker, and his first meeting with Eve. There is no part of the poem more apt to raise the attention of the reader than this discourse of our great ancestor; as nothing can be more surprising and delightful to us than to hear the sentiments that arose in the first man while he was yet new and fresh from the hands of his Creator. The poet has interwoven every thing which is delivered upon this subject in holy writ with so many beautiful imaginations of his own that nothing can be conceived more just and natural than this whole episode. As our author knew this subject could not but be agreeable to his reader, he would not throw it into the relation of the six days' work, but reserved it for a distinct episode, that he might have an opportunity of expatiating upon it more at large. [p. 250.] That secret intoxication of pleasure, with all those transient flushings of guilt and joy, which the poet represents in our first parents upon their eating the forbidden fruit, to those flaggings of spirits, damps of sorrow, and mutual accusations which succeed it, [Book XI.,] are conceived with a wonderful imagination and described in very natural sentiments. . . . As all Nature suffered by the guilt of our first parents, these symptoms of trouble and consternation are wonderfully imagined, not only as prodigies, but as marks of her sympathizing in the fall of man. [pp. 260, 261.] Satan's first appearance in the assembly of fallen angels [Book X.] is worked up with circumstances which give a delightful surprise to the reader; but there is no incident in the whole poem which does this more than the transformation of the whole audience that follows the account their leader gives them of his expedition. The gradual change of Satan himself is described after Ovid's manner, and may vie with any of those celebrated transformations which are looked upon as the most beautiful parts in that poet's works. Milton never fails of improving his own hints and bestowing the last finishing-touches to every incident which is admitted into his poem. [p. 265.] Eve's complaint upon hearing that she was to be removed from the garden of Paradise [Book XI.] is wonderfully beautiful: the sentiments are not only proper to the subject, but have something in them particularly soft and womanish:

'Must I then leave thee, Paradise, thus leave,
[quotation ending with the line
"Less pure, accustomed to immortal fruits?"]

"Adam's speech abounds with thoughts which are equally moving, and of a more masculine and elevated turn. Nothing can be conceived more sublime and poetical than the following passage in it:

'This most afflicts me, that, departing thence,'
[quotation ending with the line
"Of glory, and far off his steps adore."] pp. 273, 274.

Perhaps we cannot better conclude an extract already sufficiently lengthened than by the following excellent lines, which we especially recommend to those inconsiderate persons who are so fond of quoting a very erroneous stricture, first pronounced by Dryden, that

"Satan is the hero of Paradise Lost:"

"I have hinted, in my sixth paper on Milton, that an heroic poem, according to the opinion of the best critics, ought to end happily, and leave the mind of the reader, after having conducted it through many doubts and fears, sorrows and disquietudes, in a state of tranquillity and satisfaction. Milton's fable, which had so many other qualifications to recommend it, was deficient in this particular. It is here, therefore, that the poet has shown a most exquisite judgment, as well as the finest invention, by finding out a method to supply this natural defect in his subject. Accordingly, he leaves the adversary of mankind, in the last view which he gives of him, under the lowest state of mortification and disappointment. We see him chewing ashes, grovelling in the dust, and loaden with supernumerary pains and torments. On the contrary, our two first parents are comforted by dreams and visions, cheered with promises of salvation, and in a manner raised to a greater happiness than that which they had forfeited. In short, Satan is represented miserable in the height of his triumphs, and Adam triumphant in the height of misery."—pp. 279, 280.

After carefully perusing the whole of the criticism from which we have thus furnished such copious quotations, the reader must also consult the following passages: Addison's Works, Bohn's ed., (supra,) vol. i. 38, 151, 152; ii. 43, 63, 159, 259, 404, 506; iii. 128, 148, 371, 418; iv. 188, 263; v. 19, 221.

Of Addison's criticism Sir Egerton Brydges remarks,

"It ought to be studied and almost got by heart by every cultivated mind which understands the English language. It is in all respects a masterly performance,—just in thought, full of taste and the finest sensibility, eloquent and beautiful in composition, widely learned, and so clearly explanatory of the true principle of poetry that whoever is master of them cannot mistake in his decision of poetical merit. It puts Milton above all other poets on such tests as cannot be resisted."—Life, i. 221.

Again:

"I must here also repeat my conviction, that of all critics Addison is the most beautiful, eloquent, and just: he enters deep into the fable, the imagery, and the sentiment; most of the other commentators merely busy themselves with the explanation or illustration of the meaning. We are bound to study in which way Milton has exercised his mighty powers of invention and imagination, and what ought to be their purposes, their qualities, and their merits. If any one thinks the imagination to be an idle and empty power, he is as hard and dull as he is ignorant and blind. In the 'Paradise Lost' we have demonstrated what a grand and holy imagination can do."—Remarks on Book I., Paradise Lost, 1835.

"Addison, as is well known, was the first to bring them [Milton's merits] into popular view, by a beautiful specimen of criticism that has permanently connected his name with that of his illustrious subject."—WILLIAM H. PRESCOTT: Biog. and Crit. Miscellanies, 1855, 277; from N. Amer. Rev., xlix. 339.

Mr. Hallam by no means shares in this enthusiasm. After quoting a passage from Coleridge on The Character of Satan as delineated by Milton, (post,) he remarks,

"In reading such a paragraph as this, we are struck by the vast improvement of the highest criticism—the philosophy of æsthetics—since the days of Addison. His papers in The Spectator on Paradise Lost were perhaps superior to any criticism that had been written in our language; and we must always acknowledge their good sense, their judiciousness, and the vast service they did to our literature in settling the Paradise Lost on its proper level. But how little do they satisfy us, even in treating of the natura naturata, the poem itself! and how little conception they show of the natura naturans, the individual genius of the author! Even in the periodical criticism of the present day, in the midst of much that is affected, much that is precipitate, much that is written for mere display, we find occasional reflections of a profundity and discrimination which we should seek in vain through Dryden, or Addison, or the two Wartons, or even Johnson, though much superior to the rest. Hurd has perhaps the merit," &c.—Lit. Hist. of Europe, 4th ed., 1854, iii. 474, n. (The remainder of this passage will be found in our life of RICHARD HURD, D.D., p. 925 of this Dictionary.)

Our readers will bear us testimony that we are not sparing in our quotations from, and references to, the "periodical criticism" so justly commended by Mr. Hallam. We shall now proceed to quote some extracts from Johnson's celebrated critique on Paradise Lost: in our life of the lexicographer we considered at sufficient length (see pp. 976–977 of this Dictionary) the merits and demerits of Johnson's Life of Milton:

"I am now to examine," remarks the critic, "'Paradise Lost;' a poem which, considered with respect to design, may claim the first place, and with respect to performance the second, among the productions of the human mind. By the general consent of critics the first praise of genius is due to the writer of an epic poem, as it requires an assemblage of all the powers which are singly sufficient for other compositions. . . . The subject of an epic poem is naturally an event of great importance. That of Milton is not the destruction of a city, the conduct of a colony, or the foundation of an empire. His subject is the fate of worlds, the revolutions of Heaven and of earth; rebellion against the Supreme King, raised by the highest order of created beings; the overthrow of their host, and the punishment of their crime; the creation of a new race of reasonable creatures, their original happiness and innocence, their forfeiture of immortality, and their restoration to hope and peace.

"Great events can be hastened or retarded only by persons of elevated dignity. Before the greatness displayed in Milton's poem all other greatness shrinks away. The weakest of his agents are the highest and noblest of human beings, the original parents of mankind,—with whose actions the elements consented, on whose rectitude or deviation of will depended the state of terrestrial nature and the condition of all the future inhabitants of the globe.

"Of the other agents in the poem, the chief are such as it is irreverence to name on slight occasions. The rest were lower powers,

> —'of which the least could wield
> Those elements, and arm him with the force
> Of all their regions;'

powers which only the control of Omnipotence restrains from laying creation waste and filling the vast expanse of space with ruin and confusion. To display the motives and actions of beings thus superior, so far as human reason can examine them or human imagination represent them, is the task which this mighty poet has undertaken and performed. . . . To the completeness or integrity of the design nothing can be objected: it has distinctly and clearly what Aristotle requires,—a beginning, a middle, and an end. There is, perhaps, no poem of the same length from which so little can be taken without apparent mutilation. . . . The thoughts which are occasionally called forth in the progress are such as could only be produced by an imagination in the highest degree fervid and active, to which materials were supplied by incessant study and unlimited curiosity. The heat of Milton's mind might be said to sublimate his learning, to throw off into his work the spirit of science, unmingled with its grosser parts. He had considered creation in its whole extent, and his descriptions are therefore learned. He had accustomed his imagination to unrestrained indulgence, and his conceptions therefore were extensive. The characteristic quality of his poetry is sublimity. He sometimes descends to the elegant; but his element is the great. He can occasionally invest himself with grace; but his natural port is gigantic loftiness. [Algarotti terms it gigantesca sublimatà Miltoniana: Note.] He can please when pleasure is required; but it is his peculiar power to astonish. He seems to have been well acquainted with his own genius, and to know what it was that nature had bestowed upon him more bountifully than others,—the power of displaying the vast, illuminating the splendid, and aggravating the dreadful: he therefore chose a subject on which too much could not be said, on which he might tire his fancy without the censure of extravagance. . . . Of his moral sentiments it is hardly praise to affirm that they excel those of all other poets: for this superiority he was indebted to his acquaintance with the sacred writings. . . . From the Italian writers it appears that the advantages of even Christian knowledge may be possessed in vain. Ariosto's pravity is generally known; and, though the 'Deliverance of Jerusalem' may be considered as a sacred subject, the poet has been very sparing of moral instruction. In Milton, every line breathes sanctity of thought and purity of manners, except when the train of the narration requires the introduction of the rebellious spirits; and even they are compelled to acknowledge their subjection to God in such a manner as excites reverence and confirms piety. . . . The poet, whatever he done, is always great. . . . Dryden remarks that Miltoh has some flats among his elevations. This is only to say that all the parts are not equal. In every work one part must be for the sake of others: a palace must have passages; a poem must have transitions. It is no more to be required that wit should always be blazing than that the sun should always stand at noon. In a great work there is a vicissitude of luminous and opaque parts, as there is in the world a succession of day and night. Milton, when he has expatiated in the sky, may be allowed sometimes to revisit earth; for what other author ever soared so high or sustained his flight so long? . . . Whatever be the faults of his diction, he cannot want the praise of copiousness and variety: he was master of his language in its full extent, and has selected the melodious words with such diligence that from his book alone the art of English poetry might be learned. . . . His work is not the greatest of heroic poems only because it is not the first."

After enumerating some alleged defects in the poem, the critic continues:

"Such are the faults of that wonderful performance, 'Paradise Lost,' which he who can put in balance with its beauties must be considered not as nice but as dull, as less to be censured for want of candour than pitied for want of sensibility."—Lives of the Most Eminent English Poets, Cunningham's ed., 1854, i. 146, 147, 148, 150, 151, 152, 153, 154, 163.

We continue our citations of opinions upon Paradise Lost:

"Such is the erudition applied to this most wonderful work, that nothing less than the conjoined attempts of a whole body of learned men for a century has been able to explain its inexhaustible allusions; and even yet the task is not completed. . . . On that which pleases us individually, without consulting the feelings and opinions of others, we cannot rely; but when what delights us has made the same impression on gifted persons of all ages, and under all different circumstances, then we may be sure that its charms are intrinsic and such as it is important to bring out and render more impressive. Thus, Milton is full of imagery, which makes the spell of Homer and Virgil. . . . We do not read Milton in the same light as we read any other poet: his is the imagination of a sublime instructor: we give our faith through duty as well as will. If our fancy flags, we strain it that we may apprehend; we know that there is something which our conception ought to reach. There is not an idle word in any of the delineations which the bard exhibits; nor is any picture merely addressed to the senses. Every thing therefore is invention, arising from novelty or complexity of combination: nothing is a mere reflection from the mirror of the fancy. . . . Milton has too much condensation to be fluent: a line or two often conveys a world of images and ideas: he expatiates over all time, all space, all possibilities: he unites earth with heaven, with hell, with all intermediate existences, animate and inanimate; and his illustrations are drawn from all learning, historical, natural, and speculative. In him, almost always, 'more is meant than meets the ear.' An image, an epithet, conveys a rich picture. . . . To cite detached passages from other poets as containing a supposed similitude to Milton is very fallacious. These are patches; Milton's is a uniform, close-wove, massy web of gold. Numerous particles of the ingredients may be traced in other authors: it is the combination and the design by which that combination is conducted that makes the merit."—SIR S. EGERTON BRYDGES: from Remarks prefixed to Paradise Lost, Books II., III., V., X., XI.

"The subject of Paradise Lost is the finest that has ever been chosen for heroic poetry: it is also managed by Milton with remarkable skill. . . . The ordonnance or composition of the Paradise Lost is admirable; and here we perceive the advantage which Milton's great familiarity with the Greek theatre, and his own original scheme of the poem, had given him. Every part succeeds in an order noble, clear, and natural. . . . The conception of Satan is doubtless the first effort of Milton's genius. . . . The comparison of Milton with Homer has been founded on the acknowledged pre-eminence of each in his own language, and on the lax application of the word epic to their great poems. But there was not much in common either between their genius or its products; and Milton has taken less in direct imitation from Homer than from several other poets. His favourites had rather been Sophocles and Euripides; to them he owes the structure of his blank verse, his swell and dignity of style, his grave enunciation of moral and abstract sentiment, his tone of description, neither condensed like that of Dante, nor spread out with the diffuseness of the other Italians and of Homer himself. Next to these Greek tragedians, Virgil seems to have been his model; with the minor Latin poets, except Ovid, he does not. I think, show any great familiarity; and, though abundantly conversant with Ariosto, Tasso, and Marini, we cannot say that they influenced his manner, which, unlike theirs, is severe and stately, never light, nor, in the sense we should apply the words to them, rapid and animated.

"To Dante, however, he bears a much greater likeness. He has, in common with that poet, an uniform seriousness; for the brighter colouring of both is but the smile of a pensive mind, a fondness for argumentative speech and for the same strain of argument. This, indeed, proceeds in part from the general similarity, the religious and even theological cast, of their subjects: I advert particularly to the last part of Dante's poem. . . . We rarely meet with feeble tines in Paradise Lost, though with many that are hard and, in a common use of the word, might be called prosaic. Yet few are truly prosaic, few wherein the tone is not someway distinguished from prose. The very artificial style of Milton, sparing in English idiom, and his study of a rhythm not always the most grateful to our ears, but preserving his blank verse from a trivial flow, is the cause of this elevation. It is at least more removed from a prosaic cadence than the slovenly rhymes of such contemporary poets as Chamberlayne. His versification is entirely his own, framed on a Latin and chiefly a Virgilian model, the pause less frequently resting on the close of the line than in Homer, and much less than in our own dramatic poets. But it is also possible that the Italian and Spanish blank verse may have had some effect upon his ear." —Hallam's Lit. Hist. of Europe, 4th ed., 1854, iii. 473, 474, 475, 476, 478.

Mr. Hallam proceeds to notice some particulars in which Milton has been censured, and remarks, in conclusion,

"The faults, however, of Paradise Lost are in general less to be called faults than necessary adjuncts of the qualities we most admire, and idiosyncrasies of a mighty genius. The verse of Milton is sometimes wanting in grace, and almost always in ease; but what better can be said of his prose? His foreign idioms are too frequent in the one; but they predominate in the other."—Ibid., 480.

We quote a portion of Campbell's criticism on Milton, which Lord Jeffrey eulogizes as consisting of "splendid passages and offerings not unworthy of the shrine:"

"In delineating the blessed spirits, Milton has exhausted all the conceivable variety that could be given to pictures of unshaded sanctity; but it is chiefly in those of the fallen angels that his excellence is conspicuous above every thing ancient or modern. Tasso had, indeed, portrayed an infernal council, and had given the hint to our poet of ascribing the origin of pagan worship to those reprobate spirits. But how poor and squalid, in comparison of the Miltonic Pandemonium, are the Scyllas, the Cyclopes, and the Chimeras of the Infernal Council of the Jerusalem! Tasso's conclave of fiends is a den of ugly, incongruous monsters. The powers of Milton's hell are godlike shapes and forms. Their appearance dwarfs every other poetical conception when we turn our delighted eyes from contemplating them. It is not their external attributes alone which expand the imagination, but their souls, which are as colossal as their stature,—their 'thoughts that wander through eternity,'—the pride that burns amidst the ruins of their divine natures,—and their genius, that feels with the ardour and debates with the eloquence of heaven."—Campbell's Specimens of the British Poets, 242, 247.

"The interest of the poem arises from the daring ambition and fierce passions of Satan, and from the account of the paradisaical happiness and the loss of it by our first parents. Three-fourths of the work are taken up with these characters, and nearly all that relates to them is unmixed sublimity and beauty. The two first books alone are like two massy pillars of solid gold. Satan is the most heroic subject that ever was chosen for a poem; and the execution is as perfect as the design is lofty."—Hazlitt's Lects. on the Eng. Poets, Lect. III.

There can be no more fitting opportunity to introduce the promised remarks of Coleridge on Milton's delineation of Satan, which called forth the admiration of Mr. Hallam (ante):

"The character of Satan is pride and sensual indulgence, finding in itself the motive of action. It is the character so often seen in little on the political stage. It exhibits all the restlessness, temerity, and cunning which have marked the mighty hunters of mankind from Nimrod to Napoleon. The common fascination of man is that these great men, as they are called, must act from some great motive. Milton has carefully marked in his Satan the intense selfishness, the alcohol of egotism, which would rather reign in hell than serve in heaven. To place this lust of self in opposition to denial of self or duty, and to show what exertions it would make and what pains endure to accomplish its end, is Milton's particular object in the character of Satan. But around this character he has thrown a singularity of daring, a grandeur of sufferance, and a ruined splendour, which constitute the very height of poetic sublimity."—Coleridge's Remains, p. 176.

These lines will probably remind the reader of the eloquent language of a distinguished living critic. After a graphic portraiture of Prometheus, he continues,

"But Satan is a creature of another sphere. The might of his intellectual nature is victorious over the extremity of pain. Amidst agonies which cannot be conceived without horror, he deliberates, resolves, and even exults. Against the sword of Michael, against the thunders of Jehovah, against the flaming lake and the marl burning with solid fire, against the prospect of an eternity of unintermitted misery, his spirit bears up unbroken, resting on its own innate energies, requiring no support from any thing external, not even from hope itself."—LORD MACAULAY: Essays, Lon., 1854, i. 25; from Edin. Rev., Aug. 1825.

We have fallen upon an essay of rare power and beauty, and must lengthen our quotations:

"Though he wrote the Paradise Lost at a time of life when images of beauty and tenderness are in general beginning to fade, even from those minds in which they have not been effaced by anxiety and disappointment, he adorned it with all that is most lovely and delightful in the physical and in the moral world. Neither Theocritus nor Ariosto had a finer or a more healthful sense of the pleasantness of external objects, or loved better to luxuriate amidst sunbeams and flowers, the songs of nightingales, the juice of summer fruits, and the coolness of shady fountains. His conception of love unites all the voluptuousness of the Oriental haram, and all the gallantry of the chivalric tournament, with all the pure and quiet affection of an English fireside. His poetry reminds us of the miracles of Alpine scenery. Nooks and dells beautiful as fairy-land are embosomed in its most rugged and gigantic elevations. The roses and myrtles bloom unchilled on the verge of the avalanche. . . . The only poem of modern times which can be compared to the Paradise Lost is the Divine Comedy. . . . Of all the poets who have introduced into their works the agency of supernatural beings, Milton has succeeded best. Here Dante decidedly yields to him; and, as this is a point on which many rash and ill-considered judgments have been pronounced, we feel inclined to dwell on it a little longer."—Ibid., 17, 20, 28.

We beg the reader to study carefully, not read merely,—that, of course, he has done long since,—Lord Macaulay's comparisons between the Divina Commedia and Paradise Lost. And, among the many other essays upon the same subject, see that by Robert Southey, in the London Quarterly Review, xxxvi. 49–54; another by Hazlitt, in his Lects. on Shakspeare and Milton, (Lect. II. of the series on the English Poets;) one by William H. Prescott, the historian, in his Biographical and Critical Miscellanies, 491–493; one by Mr. Keightley, in his Life, &c. of Milton, 1855, 408–429; another by Edward Everett, in his Orations and Speeches, 1853, ii. 221–222: and that by the amiable enthusiast, Walter Savage Landor. We append brief quotations from three or four of the critics just named:

"It was said by Bentley of Warburton, in relation to his learning, that he never knew a man with so great an appetite and so bad a digestion. Milton's digestion was admirable: whatever he borrowed from the ancients he made his own; in him it does not seem quotation, but coincidence. This was not the virtue of his day: applications of passages from the classics abound to profusion in contemporary authors; but they are seldom properly assimilated to the subject-matter: they are fragments of the Parthenon in the mud walls of a Turkish cottage. Milton used them (if we may be allowed so homely an illustration) as the manufacturer uses rags,—not for patchwork, but for paper. His likeness to the ancients is much more that of expression than of feature. Sometimes, indeed, he makes an open and lavish display of his vast acquirements; but even here there is a ripeness in his knowledge which bears witness that it is not forced for the occasion, but is the fruit of years. The catalogue of the evil spirits in Paradise Lost is, perhaps, the most masterly account of ancient idolatry, brief as it is, in the English language, and at the same time serves to show that Milton had not only framed for himself a system of divinity, but a system of mythology also,—the latter, indeed, far the more mature of the two."—ROBERT SOUTHEY: Lon. Quar. Rev., xxxvi. 54–55.

Again, Southey remarks, in a letter to Horace Walpole, Bedford, Nov. 13, 1793:

"Milton is above comparison, and stands alone as much from the singularity of the subject as the excellence of the diction."—Life and Corresp., chap. i.

See also chapter xv. for some comments on Hayley's favourite theory of a striking resemblance between Milton and Cowper both as poets and men; chapter xx. for M. Simond's discovery that the poetry of Milton and Southey is to be placed on the same level; and chapter xvii. for Southey's avowal that he considered Wordsworth as great a poet as Milton: "A greater poet than Wordsworth," says Southey, "there never was nor ever will be." If Mr. Southey could prove the former assertion—and some, perhaps, might be bold enough to dissent—it would certainly be difficult to establish the latter position. But we are wandering from our theme.

"The genius of both [Dante and Milton] was of the severest kind. For this reason, any display of their sensibility, like the light breaking through a dark cloud, affects us the more by contrast. Such are the sweet pictures of domestic bliss in Paradise Lost, and the tender tale of Francesca di Rimini in the Inferno. Both are sublime in the highest signification of the term; but Milton is an ideal poet, and delights in generalization, while Dante is the most literal of artists, and paints every thing in detail. He refuses no imagery, however mean, that can illustrate his subject. This is too notorious to require exemplification. He is, moreover, eminently distinguished by the power of depicting his thought by a single vigorous touch,—a manner well known in Italy under the name of Dantesque. It would not be easy for such a verse as the following, without sacrifice of idiom, to be condensed within the same compass in our language:

'Con viso, che tacendo dicea, taci.'

"It would be interesting to trace the similarity of tastes in these great minds, as exhibited in their pleasures equally with their serious pursuits,—in their exquisite sensibility to music, in their early fondness for those ancient romances which they have so often celebrated both in prose and verse; but our limits will not allow us to pursue the subject farther."—WILLIAM H. PRESCOTT: Biog. and Crit. Miscellanies, 1855, 492–493; from N. Amer. Rev., xxxiii. 33: Poetry and Romance of the Italians, q. v.

See also Prescott's Miscellanies, 411, 467, 468, 559, 598, 600, 634, 637.

The above may remind the reader of some eloquent lines by the same author in another place:

"To say nothing of the 'Divina Commedia,' wh is there that rises from the perusal of 'Paradise Lost' without feeling his own conceptions of the angelic hierarchy quickened by those of the inspired artist, and a new and sensible form, as it were, given to images which had before floated dim and undefined before him?" —Hist. of the Conq. of Mexico, 23d ed., 1855, i. 55.

"In 'Paradise Lost' we feel as if we were admitted to the outer courts of the Infinite. In that all-glorious temple of genius inspired by truth, we catch the full diapason of the heavenly organ. With its first choral swell the soul is lifted from the earth. In the 'Divina Commedia' the man, the Florentine, the exiled Ghibelline, stands out, from first to last, breathing defiance and revenge.

Milton, in some of his prose works, betrays the partisan also; but in his poetry we see him in the white robes of the minstrel, with upturned though sightless eyes, rapt in meditation at the feet of the heavenly muse. Dante, in his dark vision, descends to the depths of the world of perdition, and, homeless fugitive as he is, drags his proud and prosperous enemies down with him, and buries them, doubly destroyed, in the flaming sepulchres of the lowest hell. Milton, on the other hand, seems almost to have purged off the dross of humanity. Blind, poor friendless, in solitude and sorrow, with quite as much reason as his Italian rival to repine at his fortune and war against mankind, how calm and unimpassioned is he in all that concerns his own personality! He deemed too highly of his divine gift to make it the instrument of immortalizing his hatreds. One cry alone of sorrow at his blindness, one pathetic lamentation over the evil days on which he had fallen, bursts from his full heart. There is not a flash of human wrath in all his pictures of woe. Hating nothing but evil spirits, in the childlike simplicity of his heart, his pure hands undefiled with the pitch of the political intrigues in which he had lived, he breathes forth his inexpressibly majestic strains,—the poetry not so much of earth as heaven."—EDWARD EVERETT: Orations and Speeches, 1853, ii. 222–223.

We have already given some extracts from an Essay on the Poetical Genius of Milton, by another distinguished American writer,—Dr. William Ellery Channing,—and commend the whole paper to the reader's perusal. Dr. Channing considers

"Paradise Lost perhaps the noblest monument of human genius. The two first books, by universal consent, stand pre-eminent in sublimity. Hell and hell's kingdom have a terrible harmony, and dilate into new grandeur and awfulness, the longer we contemplate them. From one element, 'solid and liquid fire,' the poet has framed a world of horror and suffering such as imagination had never traversed."

"No epic poet excites emotions so fervid as Homer, or possesses so much fire; but in point of sublimity he cannot be compared to Milton. . . . The sublime has for its object the imagination only, and its influence is not so much to occasion any fervour of feeling as the calmness of fixed astonishment. If we consider the sublime as thus distinguished from every other quality, Milton will appear to possess it in an unrivalled degree; and here, indeed, lies the secret of his power. The perusal of Homer inspires us with an ardent sensibility, Milton with the stillness of surprise. The one fills and delights the mind with the confluence of various emotions; the other amazes with the vastness of his ideas. The movements of Milton's mind are steady and progressive: he carries the fancy through successive stages of elevation, and gradually increases the heat by adding fuel to the fire."—REV. ROBERT HALL.

"If ever any poem was truly poetical, if ever any abounded with poetry, it is 'Paradise Lost.' What an expansion of facts from a small seed of history! What worlds are invented, what embellishments of nature upon what our senses present us with! . . . The poem opens the fountains of knowledge, piety, and virtue, and pours along full streams of peace, comfort, and joy, to such as can penetrate the true sense of the writer and obediently listen to his song. In reading the Iliad or Æneid we treasure up a collection of fine imaginative pictures, as when we read 'Paradise Lost,' only that from thence we have (to speak like a connoisseur) more Rafaelles, Correggios, Guidos, &c. Milton's pictures are more sublime and great, divine and lively, than Homer's or Virgil's, or those of any other poet, ancient or modern."—JONATHAN RICHARDSON.

"Throughout the whole of 'Paradise Lost' the author appears to have been a most critical reader and passionate admirer of the Holy Scripture: he is indebted to Scripture infinitely more than to Homer and Virgil and all other books whatever. Not only the principal fable, but all his episodes, are founded upon Scripture: the Scripture has not only furnished him with the noblest hints, raised his thoughts, and fired his imagination, but has also very much enriched his language, given a certain solemnity and majesty to his diction, and supplied him with many of his choicest, happiest expressions. Let men, therefore, learn from this instance to reverence the Sacred Writings: if any man can pretend to deride or despise them, it must be said of him, at least, that he has a taste and genius the most different from Milton's that can be imagined. Whoever has any true taste and genius, we are confident, will esteem this poem the best of all modern productions, and the Scriptures the best of all ancient ones."—BISHOP NEWTON.

"Milton advanced into regions of which every other poet had stopped and trembled at the dark confines, and of which the inhabitants might almost have mistaken him, as to his intellectual grandeur, for one of themselves."—Foster's Critical Essays, 1856, i. 146.

"How has Milton united power, and fear, and physical pangs in vast and dread sublimity, when he has shown those mighty fallen angels, in their yet unvanquished and seemingly indestructible strength, arraying themselves to new war in the midst of their dolorous dwellings of pain in the dark and fiery dwelling-place of their eternal torment! . . . It is generally agreed that among the most successful parts of Paradise Lost are those which represent the character of the fallen angels; and yet these sublime and tragical soliloquies are founded chiefly on personal feeling, which, although it may be made a source of consummate pathos and dramatic beauty, is certainly not the region of the human mind from whence the highest possible impressions are to be drawn."—Prof. John Wilson's Essays, Crit. and Imag., 1856, i. 395; 1857, iv. 159.

"If we except Paradise Lost, where all is supernatural, and where the ancestors of the human race are not strictly human beings, it must be owned that no successful attempt has been made to ally a human action with the sublimer principles of the Christian theology."—SIR JAMES MACKINTOSH: Edin. Rev., xxii. 46.

See the same periodical, xlii. 55–57,—English Poetry,— for a most eloquent eulogy on Paradise Lost. The introduction of the name of Sir James Mackintosh may recall to our readers his remark:

"Among the victories gained by Milton, one of the most signal is that which he obtained over all the prejudices of Johnson, who was compelled to make a most vigorous, though evidently a reluctant, effort to do justice to the fame and genius of the greatest of English poets."—Mackintosh's Life, vol. iii. chap. iii.

"After I have been reading the Paradise Lost I can take up no other poet with satisfaction. I seem to have left the music of Handel for the music of the streets, or, at best, for drums and fifes. Although in Shakspeare there are occasional bursts of harmony no less sublime, yet if there were many such in continuation it would be hurtful, not only in comedy, but also in tragedy. The greater part should be equable and conversational. . . . . My predilection in youth was on the side of Homer; for I had read the Iliad twice, and the Odyssea once, before the Paradise Lost. Averse as I am to every thing relating to theology, and especially to the view of it thrown open by this poem, I recur to it incessantly as the noblest specimen in the world of eloquence, harmony, and genius. . . . If ever there was a poet who knew Nature well and described her in all her loveliness, it was Milton. In the Paradise Lost, how profuse in his descriptions, as became the time and place! in the Allegro and Penseroso, how exquisite and select!"—W. S. LANDOR.

"A subject so remote from the affairs of this world may furnish ground, to those who think such discussions material, to bring it into doubt whether Paradise Lost can properly be classed among epic poems. By whatever name it is to be called, it is undoubtedly one of the highest efforts of poetical genius; and in one great characteristic of the epic poem, majesty and sublimity, it is fully equal to any that bear that name. . . . The subject which he has chosen suited the daring sublimity of his genius. It is a subject for which Milton alone was fitted; and in the conduct of it he has shown a stretch both of imagination and invention which is perfectly wonderful. It is astonishing how, from the few hints given us in the Sacred Scriptures, he was able to raise so complete and regular a structure and to fill his poem with such a variety of incidents. . . . Milton's great and distinguishing excellence is his sublimity. In this, perhaps, he excels Homer,—as there is no doubt of his leaving Virgil and every other poet far behind him. . . . Milton's sublimity is of a different kind from that of Homer. Homer's is generally accompanied with fire and impetuosity; Milton's possesses more of a calm and amazing grandeur. Homer warms and hurries us along; Milton fixes us in a state of astonishment and elevation. Homer's sublimity appears most in the description of actions, Milton's in that of wonderful and stupendous objects. But, though Milton is most distinguished for his sublimity, yet there is also much of the beautiful, the tender, and the pleasing, in many parts of his work. . . . He discovers a vigour, a grasp of genius, equal to every thing that is great: if at some times he falls much below himself, at other times he rises above every poet of the ancient or modern world."—Blair's Lects. on Rhetoric and Belles-Lettres, Lect. XLIV.

Lord Brougham, in his sketch of Erskine, remarks,

"Aware that his classical acquirements were so slender, men sometimes marvelled at the phenomenon of his eloquence,—above all, of his composition. The solution of the difficulty lay in the constant reading of the old English authors to which he devoted himself. Shakspeare he was more familiar with than almost any man of his age; and Milton he nearly had by heart. Nor can it be denied that the study of the speeches in 'Paradise Lost' is as good a substitute as can be found for the immortal originals in the Greek models upon which those great productions have manifestly been formed."—Statesmen of the Time of George III., 1855, i. 317.

"Of the general, and, as it may be termed, the patriarchal, doctrine of the ministry of angels, no poet has made so admirable a use as Milton, who tells us, in his Paradise Lost, that

> 'Millions of spiritual creatures walk the earth
> Unseen, both when we wake and when we sleep,' &c."

"Many other poets have excelled him in variety and versatility: but none ever approached him in intensity of style and thought, in unity of purpose, and in the power and grandeur with which he piles up the single monument of genius to which his mind is for the time devoted. . . . The sublime is reached by other poets when they excel themselves and hover for a moment amidst unusual brightness; but it is Milton's native region. When he descends, it is to meet the greatness of others; when he soars, it is to reach heights unattainable to any but himself. The two first books of 'Paradise Lost' are one continuous effort of intense sublimity. I know of no spot, or blemish, or inequality, or falling off, from the beginning of the First Book to the close of the Second; and then how wonderfully fine is the contrast, when the Third Book opens with that inimitably pathetic address to Light, in which the poet alludes, with a pardonable egotism, to the calamity under which he is himself suffering:

> "'Hail, holy Light! offspring of Heaven first-born,
> Or of the Eternal co-eternal beam.'"

"Milton is the most learned of our English poets. There is no work of either this or any other country on which so much profound erudition has been expended as on Paradise Lost. The learning of all ages, the opinions of the wisest men, the superstitions of the most benighted nations, the truths of philosophy and science, and the most solemn mysteries of religion, were all explored by the great author, and he poured out the whole vast treasure of his mind into the golden vase his imagination had formed."—Rev. H. Stebbing: Memoir of Milton.

"It was during a state of poverty, blindness, disgrace, danger, and old age that Milton composed his wonderful poem, which not only surpassed all the performances of his contemporaries, but all the compositions which had flowed from his pen during the vigour of his age and the height of his prosperity. This circumstance is not the least remarkable of all those which attend that great genius. . . . There are very long passages, amounting to near a third of the work, almost wholly destitute of harmony and elegance, nay, of all vigour of imagination. This natural inequality of Milton's genius was much increased by the inequalities in his subject; of which some parts are of themselves the most lofty that can enter into human conception; others would have required the most laboured elegance of composition to support them."—Hume's Hist. of England, Bowyer's ed., 1806, iv. 666, 667.

"Paradise Lost is the last great heroic poem that the world has seen,—perhaps the last that it will ever see. Putting Dante's poem aside for the present, we may assert that it is the only successful poem on a religious subject; and it may be doubted if religion supplies any other theme for poetry than that which Milton selected. . . . If any form [of poetry] prevailed most in Milton's mind, we think it was the dramatic,—that is, such as it appeared on the theatre at Athens; and, had Milton flourished in ancient Greece, this is the species of poetry to which he would have devoted himself, equalling, as we have said, Æschylus in sublimity and surpassing him in amenity; equalling Sophocles in amenity and dignity and surpassing him in sublimity and vigour, and not inferior to him in skilful arrangement. . . . There are few, if any, who can completely understand Milton's heroic poetry without the aid of a comment; and we will venture to assert that when one has fixed in his memory the positions of the places named by the poet, and some of the political events connected with them, these very passages will ever after be among those which he will peruse with the greatest pleasure. We must repeat that Paradise Lost is one of those poems which must be studied carefully and with the aid of notes to be fully understood and enjoyed."—Keightley's Life, &c. of Milton, 409, 413.

"The Battle of the Angels, in the 6th Book,—a most daring effort of invention,—is supported with wonderful force, fire, and sublimity, and rises to the last. . . . In the 9th Book, Milton naturalises the Fall of Man with admirable address. The interest of the poem, no doubt, in some measure declines as it advances; but, upon the whole, my opinion of this astonishing effort of genius is greatly raised by this review of it. Compare the slender and unpromising stamina on which Milton had to work with the stupendous production which he has formed upon them:—this is the way to estimate his powers of invention, the great characteristic of a poet."—Green's Diary of a Lover of Lit., Feb. 7th, 1800, Ipswich, 1810, 4to, 198.

The critics next to be quoted do not appear to agree in the opinion that the "interest of the poem declines as it advances:"

"I wish the Paradise Lost were more carefully read and studied than I can see any ground for believing it is,—especially those parts which, from the habit of always looking for a story in poetry, are scarcely read at all,—as, for example, Adam's vision of future events, in the 11th and 12th books. No one can rise from a perusal of this immortal poem without a deep sense of the grandeur and purity of Milton's soul."—Coleridge.

"Milton's poem ends very nobly. The last speeches of Adam and the archangel are full of moral and instructive sentiments. The sleep that fell upon Eve, and the effects it had in quieting the disorders of her mind, produce the same kind of consolation in the reader, who cannot peruse the last beautiful speech which is ascribed to the mother of mankind without a secret pleasure and satisfaction. The following lines, which conclude the poem, rise in a most glorious blaze of poetical images and expressions."—Addison.

"In the concluding passage of the poem there is brought together, with uncommon strength of fancy and rapidity of narrative, a number of circumstances wonderfully adapted to the purpose of filling the mind with ideas of terrific grandeur:—the descent of the cherubim; the flaming sword; the archangel leading in haste our first parents down from the heights of Paradise, and then disappearing; and, above all, the scene that presents itself on their looking behind them:

> 'They, looking back, all th' eastern side beheld
> Of Paradise, so late their happy seat,
> Waved over by that flaming brand; the gate
> With dreadful faces throng'd and fiery arms:'

to which the remaining verses form the most striking contrast that can be imagined. The final couplet renews our sorrow, by exhibiting, with picturesque accuracy, the most mournful scene in nature; which yet is so prepared as to raise comfort and dispose to resignation. And thus, while we are at once melting in tenderness, elevated with pious hope, and overwhelmed with the grandeur of description, the divine poem concludes."—Dr. Beattie.

"A poem, however wonderfully pregnant with the delectare, will be wanting in its most essential part if it does not close with the monere or materially involve it. This, I much incline to believe, could not have been done in the present poem in a more judicious, momentous, dignified, and truly poetical manner than that of our author."—Dunster.

"The very story never relaxes: it is thick-wove with incident as well as sentiment and argumentative grandeur. And how it closes!—when the archangel waves the 'flaming brand' over the eastern gate of Paradise, and, on looking back, Adam and Eve saw the 'dreadful faces' and 'fiery arms' that throng'd round it! In what other poem is any passage so heart-rending and so terrible as this?"—Sir S. Egerton Brydges.

We conclude our quotations on Paradise Lost with some extracts from distinguished foreign critics. As regards the similarity said to exist in this poem to the productions of some distinguished Continental authors—Vida, Sannazarius, Romæus, Mosenius, Staphorst, Taubman, Andreini, Quintianus, Malapert, Saint-Avitas, Dubartas, and Tasso, for instance—we must refer the reader to some of the authorities quoted in this article, and to other pages of our Dictionary:

"The Paradise Lost partakes in all those difficulties and defects which, as I have said, attend all Christian poems which attempt to make the mysteries of our religion the subjects of their fiction. It is strange that Milton did not observe that the loss of Paradise forms in itself no complete whole, but is only the first act of the great Christian history of man, wherein the creation, the fall, and the redemption are all equally necessary parts of one mighty drama. It is true that he sought afterwards to remove this main defect by the addition of the Paradise Regained: but this poem is too insignificant in its purpose and size to be worthy of forming the key-stone to the great work. When compared with the Catholic poets Dante and Tasso, who were his models, Milton, as a Protestant, laboured under considerable disadvantages by being entirely denied the use of a great many symbolical representations, histories, and traditions which were in their hands the most graceful ornaments of Christian poetry. He was sensible of this, and attempted to make amends for the defect by adopting fables and allegories out of the Koran and the Talmud, such as are extremely unfit for the use of a Christian poet. The excellence of his epic work consists, therefore, not in the plan of the whole so much as in particular beauties and passages, and, in general, in the perfection of the high language of poetry."—Frederick Schlegel: Lects. on the Hist. of Lit., 1812.

"Milton, with his sublime genius, is in a certain point of view the most irregular of poets. For he not only departs from rules, but he casts them down with the strength of a giant and builds up a new poetic world on their ruins. For this reason, his wonderful poem cannot be assigned a place in any of the departments which are usually regarded as the only possible ones for poetic creations. He takes at once into his great poetic ocean the whole of the four paradisal rivers of poetry,—the epic, the lyric, the didactic, and the dramatic. It has therefore been justly observed that the proper object of the poem is didactic, as the poet will by means of it 'justify the ways of God to men.' It is epic merely by the greatness of the action and the episodes respecting the war in heaven. But the action itself is dramatic both in design and execution, and the main interest, from beginning to end, dwells about a single great tragic character,—the fallen archangel. Finally, the poem is lyric, not only in single passages, but even in general, in its whole tone and expression. Thus, then, the Paradise Lost, in a poetic point of view, forms a species in itself, without a model, and as yet without a copy; but to think of rejecting it on this account would be to sacrifice the just rights of genius to the crotchets of the schools. The power with which this wonderful poem seizes on every mind of a deeper and more serious cast only proves the poverty of our ordinary poetic theories."—Esaias Tegnér, Bishop of Vexiö. Sweden, author of the Frithiofs Saga: Remarks on Count Oxenstjerna's Translation of Paradise Lost. See Keightley's Life, &c. of Milton, 409.

"On what occasions does the spirit of rage, the king of evil, utter reflections which may be called wise? First, when contemplating the beauty of the sun; secondly, in contemplating the beauty of the earth; thirdly, in contemplating the beauty of two beings who in peaceful converse assure each other of their mutual love; fourthly, in contemplating one of these creatures alone, among trees, cultivating flowers, the image of innocence and tranquillity. All that is good and fair at first excites his admiration: this awakens remorse, by the remembrance of what he has lost, and the results of his remorse only harden him the more in crime. The king of evil by degrees becomes worthy of his new empire. Eve gathering flowers appears to him happy: her serenity is the pleasure of innocence: he hastens to destroy what he admires, because he is the destroyer of all happiness. In these four soliloquies Milton has preserved the same character for Satan, without copying himself. Satan is not the hero of his poem, but the masterpiece of his poetry."—Louis Racine.

"Ce poëme, qui s'ouvre aux enfers et finit au ciel, en passant sur la terre, n'a dans le vaste désert de la création nouvelle que deux personnages humains: les autres sont les habitants surnaturels de l'abîme des félicités sans fin, ou du gouffre des misères éternelles. Eh bien! le poëte a osé entrer dans cette solitude; il s'y présente, comme d'un fils d'Adam, député de la race humaine perdue par la désobéissance; il y paraît comme l'hiérophante, comme le prophète chargé d'apprendre l'histoire de la chute de l'homme, et de la chanter sur la harpe consacrée aux pénitences de David. Il est si rempli de génie, de sainteté, et de grandeur que sa noble tête n'est point déplacée auprès de celle de notre premier père, . . . en présence de Dieu et des anges. On sent en effet dans ce poëme à travers la passion des légères années, la maturité de l'âge, et la gravité du malheur,—ce qui donne au Paradis Perdu un charme extraordinaire de vieillesse et de jeunesse, d'inquiétude et de paix, de tristesse et de joie, de raison et d'amour."—Vicomte de Chateaubriand: Étude Historique et Littéraire sur Milton et son Temps: Le Paradis Perdu, Traduction de Chateaubriand, Paris, 1855.

"Le peu de succès du Paradis Perdu au moment de sa publication ne découragea pas le poëte. La misère domestique éteint sa muse. Chaque fois que le pain manquait à la maison, sa femme et ses filles le conjuraient de chanter ou d'écrire pour tirer de ses chants ou de ses pages quelque mince salaire nécessaire à l'entretien de la pauvre famille. C'est ainsi qu'il composa, comme son modèle l'aveugle Homère, ses derniers vers et les plus beaux de ses œuvres. La vieillesse semblait donner un accent plus pathétique à son voix. Son âme était comme ces instruments à la corde, qui ont peu de sons quand ils sortent des mains de l'ouvrier, mais que la vétusté du bois rend plus sonores, et dont ce qu'on appelle l'âme gémit et pleure plus mélodieusement dans le bois presque vermoulu de l'instrument."—A. DE LAMARTINE: Réflexions sur la Vie et les Ouvrages de Milton: Le Paradis Perdu, Traduction de Chateaubriand, Paris, 1855.

Paradise Regained.

It is to Ellwood, Milton's amiable Quaker friend, that we are indebted for this poem. On returning the MS. of Paradise Lost, of which the author had desired his perusal and judgment, he remarked,

"'Thou hast said much here of Paradise Lost; but what hast thou to say of Paradise found?' He made me no answer, but sat some time in a muse, then broke off the discourse and fell upon another subject.

"After the sickness was over, and the city well cleansed and become safely habitable again, he returned thither; [the interview above referred to occurred at Giles Chalfont, Milton's country-residence;] and when, afterwards, I went to wait on him there,—which I seldom failed of doing whenever my occasion led me to London,—he showed me his second poem, called Paradise Regained, and, in a pleasant tone, said to me, 'This is owing to you; for you put it into my head by the question you put to me at Chalfont, which before I had not thought of.'"

"In none of his works is his reading made so directly subservient to his end as in his Paradise Regained,—a poem arguing in its author a more than common confidence in the exuberance of his own resources. It was a bold scheme, indeed, to undertake the structure of even so short an epic as this out of the history of our Lord's temptation,—comprised as that history is in half a score verses of St. Matthew, and forbidding by its very nature any violent interference with recorded facts. Yet the imagination of Milton, duly exercised upon those elements with which his memory was stored, enabled him to expand his subject, without profaning it, into a poem which had it been only an episode (as it should have been) would have borne a comparison with the happiest that have been written. Our Lord is 'an-hungered,' and, through that appetite, tempted of the devil. Narrow as this ground is, for Milton it is enough; and he forthwith raises a table in the wilderness, furnished from 'Pontus, and Lucrine lake, and Afric coast,' and the charming pipes are heard to play, and Arabian odours and early flowers breathe around, and nymphs and naiads of Diana's train are summoned forth to dance beneath the shade, and the whole is combined into one of those splendid banquets with which nothing but a most perfect knowledge of antiquity could have supplied him. Again, Satan takes 'the Saviour up into an exceeding high mountain, and shows him the kingdoms of the world and the glory of them.' Then is the scholar awakened once more: the hint suffices to unlock the magazines of his learning; the fountains of that great deep are broken up; and now the Parthians, with all their martial appointments and the evolutions peculiar to them, appear before us in the most faithful array: and now, in her turn, Rome, under Tiberius, is depicted with the spirit indeed of a poet, but with the accuracy of a contemporary annalist; and her imperial palace, the houses of her gods, the conflux of divers nations and languages at her gates, the embassies from far crowding the Emilian and Appian roads, the prætors and proconsuls hasting to their provinces or on their triumphant return, all fill the mind's eye, till it is again carried away 'to the westward,' and the flowery hill of Hymettus offers itself to our notice, and Athens, with its picturesque suburbs, is unfolded with a perspicuity and precision that might challenge the most scrupulous critic to quarrel even with an epithet, (so true is Milton to his Grecian masters;) whilst her schools of philosophy, the sects into which they are divided, the dogmas they severally espoused, all pass in rapid review, leaving us confounded at the mental plenitude of this extraordinary man."—ROBERT SOUTHEY: Lon. Quar. Rev., xxxvi. 55–56.

"Of 'Paradise Regained' the general judgment seems now to be right, that it is in many parts elegant, and everywhere instructive. It was not to be supposed that the writer of 'Paradise Lost' could ever write without great effusions of fancy and exalted precepts of wisdom. The basis of 'Paradise Regained' is narrow: a dialogue without action can never please like an union of the narrative and dramatic powers. Had this poem been written not by Milton, but by some imitator, it would have claimed and received universal praise."—Dr. Johnson's Life of Milton.

"Milton had already executed one extensive divine poem, peculiarly distinguished by richness and sublimity of description. In framing a second, he naturally wished to vary its effect,—to make it rich in moral sentiment and sublime in its mode of unfolding the highest wisdom that man can learn. For this purpose it was necessary to keep all the ornamental parts of the poem in due subordination to the precept. This delicate and difficult point is accomplished with such felicity, they are blended together with such exquisite harmony and mutual aid, that instead of arraigning the plan we might rather doubt if any possible change could improve it. Assuredly there is no poem of an epic form where the sublimest moral is so forcibly and so abundantly united to poetical delight. The splendour of the poet does not blaze, indeed, so intensely as in his larger productions: here he resembles the Apollo of Ovid, softening his glory in speaking to his son and avoiding to dazzle the fancy that he may descend into the heart. To censure the Paradise Regained because it does not more resemble the Paradise Lost is hardly less absurd than it would be to condemn the moon for not being a sun, instead of admiring the two different luminaries and feeling that both the greater and the less are equally the work of the same divine and inimitable power."—HAYLEY.

"There are several of the minor poems of Milton on which we would willingly make a few remarks. Still more willingly would we enter into a detailed examination of that admirable poem, the Paradise Regained, which, strangely enough, is scarcely ever mentioned except as an instance of the blindness of the parental affection which men of letters bear towards the offspring of their intellects. That Milton was mistaken in preferring this work, excellent as it is, to the Paradise Lost, we readily admit. But we are sure that the superiority of the Paradise Lost to the Paradise Regained is not more decided than the superiority of the Paradise Regained to every poem which has since made its appearance. Our limits, however, prevent us from discussing the point at length. We hasten on to that extraordinary production which the general suffrage of critics has placed in the highest class of human compositions."—LORD MACAULAY: Crit. and Histor. Essays, 1854, i. 17.

"They who talk of our author's genius being in the decline when he wrote his second poem, and would therefore turn from it as from a dry prosaic composition, are, I will venture to say, no judges of poetry. With a fancy such as Milton's, it must have been more difficult to forbear poetic decorations than to furnish them; and the glaring profusion of ornament would, I conceive, have more decidedly betrayed the poeta senescens than a want of it. . . . The 'Paradise Regained' has something of the didactic character: it teaches not merely by the general moral shed by the character and conduct of its hero, but has also many positive precepts everywhere interspersed. It is written, for the most part, in a style admirably condensed, and with a studied reserve of ornament: it is, nevertheless, illuminated with beauties of the most captivating kind. Its leading feature throughout is that 'excellence of composition' which, as Lord Monboddo justly observes, so eminently distinguished the writings of the ancients, and in which, of all modern authors, Milton most resembles them."—DUNSTER.

"'Paradise Regained' has not met with the approbation that it deserves. It has not the harmony of numbers, the sublimity of thought, and the beauties of diction which are in 'Paradise Lost:' it is composed in a lower and less striking style,—a style suited to the subject. Artful sophistry, false reasoning, set off in the most specious manner, and refuted by the Son of God with unaffected eloquence, is the peculiar excellence of this poem."—DR. JORTIN.

"I am only surprised at the boldness of the poet in choosing this sublime theme. He could not have foreseen all its difficulties; but, knowing his own perfect familiarity with the scriptural language, his gigantic mind hazarded the task. This alone is a proof that he was not conscious of any 'failure of strength.' And there is not a single passage in the execution which indicates any such failure: with whatever else compared of his immortal writings, the imagery is as distinct and picturesque; the spiritual part, the thoughts and arguments, are, at least, equally vigorous, original, discriminative, and profound, and, perhaps, more abundant; nor has the language less of that naked strength which supports itself by its own intrinsic power."—SIR S. EGERTON BRYDGES.

"Readers would not be disappointed in this latter poem if they proceeded to a perusal of it with a proper preconception of the kind of interest intended to be excited in that admirable work. In its kind it is the most perfect poem extant, though its kind may be inferior in interest—being in its essence didactic—to that other sort in which instruction is conveyed more effectually, because less directly, in connection with stronger and more pleasurable emotions, and thereby in a closer affinity with action. But might we not as rationally object to an accomplished woman's conversing very agreeably because it happened that we had received a keener pleasure from her singing to the harp?"—COLERIDGE: Lects. on Shakspeare, &c., ii. 121.

"Paradise Regained is the most perfect in execution of any thing written by Milton."—WORDSWORTH: Life, ii. 311.

"We have quoted the opinions of these two critics," remarks Mr. Keightley, "because they were themselves poets of a high order, and their decisions are therefore entitled to the utmost attention. It thus appears plain why, as Phillips says, Milton, when it was accounted inferior to Paradise Lost, 'could not bear with patience any such thing related to him.' He knew well that it was as perfect, if not more so, in its kind, as that wonderful poem. In fact, blemishes have been found, and some with justice, in Paradise Lost, but none, to our knowledge, in Paradise Regained."—Life, &c. of Milton, 405.

Mr. Keightley here speaks with the haste common to enthusiastic and indiscriminate admiration.

"Finished the Paradise Regained. Milton has been most unhappy in the choice of his subject; . . . but he has worked it up with wonderful ability. Nor am I surprised at his partiality for an offspring . . . which he must have reared with such surprising pains and assiduity. Milton has been extolled for the exquisite delicacy of his ear; but what shall I say to such lines as these?—

'And made him bow to the gods of his wives.'—B. 2, v. 171.
'And with these words his temptation pursued.'—B. 2, v. 405.
'From that placid aspect and meek regard.'—B. 3, v. 217.
'No wonder, for though in thee be united.'—B. 3, v. 229.

How are they to be recited? To my ears, 'Lay your knife and your fork across your plate' sounds just as numerous. (Newton's note on v. 245, B. 4.) . . . Milton, in 16 lines, from v. 293 to 308. B. 4, gives a good summary of the systems of the different moral philosophers of Greece."—Green's Diary of a Lover of Lit., March 1st, 1799, Ipswich, 1810, 4to, 126.

"Talked of Milton: his greater laxity of metre in the 'Paradise Regained' than in the 'Paradise Lost.' R[ogers], thought this was from system; but Crowe and I thought it from laziness. Crowe had reckoned the instances of lines with supernumerary syllables, and found more in the first two books of 'Paradise Regained' than in all 'Paradise Lost.'"—Tom Moore's Diary: Memoirs, &c., 1853, ii. 200.

"Milton has no idealism,—not even in the Paradise Regained, where there was most scope for it. His poetry is for the most part quite literal; and the objects he describes have all a certain definiteness and individuality which separates them from the infinite. He has often endeavoured to present images where every thing should have been lost in sentiment."—Prof. Wilson's Essays, Crit. and Imag., 1856, i. 396.

"'Paradise Regained' is tedious, though calm and beautiful."—Chateaubriand's Sketches of Eng. Lit., 1837, ii. 116.

"The neglect which Paradise Lost never experienced seems to have been long the lot of Paradise Regained. It was not popular with the world; it was long believed to manifest a decay of the poet's genius; and, in spite of all that the critics have written, it is still but the favourite of some whose predilections for the Miltonic style are very strong. The subject is so much less capable of calling forth the vast powers of his mind that we should be unfair in comparing it throughout with the greater poem: it has been called a model of the shorter epic, an action comprehending few characters and a brief space of time. [Todd's Milton, vol. v. p. 308, note.] The love of Milton for dramatic dialogue, imbibed from Greece, is still more apparent than in Paradise Lost: the whole poem, in fact, may almost be accounted a drama of primal simplicity, the narrative and descriptive part serving rather to diversify and relieve the speeches of the actors, than their speeches, as in the legitimate epic, to enliven the narration. Paradise Regained abounds with passages equal to any of the same nature in Paradise Lost; but the argumentative tone is kept up till it produces some tediousness; and perhaps, on the whole, less pains have been exerted to adorn and elevate that which appeals to the imagination."—Hallam's Lit. Hist. of Europe, 4th ed., 1854, iii. 481.

Mr. Hallam remarks, on an earlier page of his work,

"We know how finely Milton—whose ear pursued almost to excess the pleasure of harmonious names, and who loved to expatiate in these imaginary regions—has alluded to Boiard's poem in the Paradise Regained. The lines are perhaps the most musical he has ever produced:

> 'Such forces met not, nor so wide a camp,
> When Agrican with all his northern powers
> Besieged Albracca, as romancers tell,
> The city of Gallaphrone, from thence to win
> The fairest of her sex, Angelica,
> His daughter, sought by many prowest knights,
> Both paynim and the peers of Charlemain.'"—i. 226.

"Should a poet of loftier muse than Milton hereafter appear,—or, to speak more reverently, when the Milton of a better age shall arise,—there is yet remaining one subject worthy his powers,—the counterpart of 'Paradise Lost.' In the conception of this subject by Milton, then mature in the experience of his great poem, we have the highest human judgment that this is the one remaining theme. In his uncompleted attempt to achieve it we have the greatest cause for the doubt whether it be not beyond the grasp of the human mind in its present state of cultivation. But I am unwilling to think that this theme, immeasurably the grandest which can be contemplated by the mind of man, will never receive a practical illustration proportioned to its sublimity. It seems to me impossible that the time—perhaps far distant—should not eventually arrive when another Milton, divorcing his heart from the delights of life, purifying his bosom from its angry and its selfish passions, relieved by happier fortunes from care and sorrows, pluming the wings of his spirit in solitude by abstinence and prayer, will address himself to this only remaining theme of a great Christian epic."—Edward Everett: Orations and Speeches, ii. 223–224.

L'Allegro and Il Penseroso.

"Milton's lesser poems, indeed, (unaccountable as it may seem,) appear for a long while to have fallen into utter neglect; and the first attention paid to the Penseroso and Allegro by a writer of any note is in the Eloisa of Pope, where some remarkable expressions from those exquisite pieces are adopted without acknowledgment, and, perhaps, under the impression that to works so little known no acknowledgment was due. Even in a paper of The Spectator some lines are quoted by one of the correspondents as taken from 'a poem of Milton's which he entitles Il Penseroso,'—a form of speech which, as the context shows it not to be intended for something characteristic of the individual using it, argues the poem itself to have been but little read at the time. It is difficult to conceive a stronger proof of the gross depravity of taste which prevailed during the reign of Charles II. than the simple fact that these two noble efforts of human imagination for a season expired under its sensual influence:

> 'Fie on sinful phantasy!
> Robert Southey: Lon. Quar. Rev., xxxvi. 41.

"Of the two pieces 'L'Allegro' and 'Il Penseroso,' I believe opinion is uniform: every man that reads them reads them with pleasure. The author's design is not, what Theobald has remarked, merely to show how objects derive their colours from the mind by representing the operation of the same things upon the gay and melancholy temper, or upon the same man as he is differently disposed, but rather how, among the successive variety of appearances, every disposition of mind takes hold on those by which it may be gratified. . . . Through these two poems the images are properly selected and nicely distinguished; but the colours of the diction seem not sufficiently discriminated. I know not whether the characters are kept sufficiently apart. No mirth can, indeed, be found in his melancholy; but I am afraid that I always meet some melancholy in his mirth. They are two noble efforts of imagination."—Dr. Johnson's Life of Milton.

"'L'Allegro' and 'Il Penseroso' may be called the two first descriptive poems in the English language. It is perhaps true that the characters are not sufficiently kept apart; but this circumstance has been productive of greater excellencies. It has been remarked, 'No mirth, indeed, can be found in his melancholy; but I am afraid I always meet some melancholy in his mirth.' Milton's is the dignity of mirth; his cheerfulness is the cheerfulness of gravity; the objects he selects in his 'L'Allegro' are so far gay as they do not naturally excite sadness; laughter and jollity are named only as personifications, and never exemplified; 'quips, and cranks, and wanton wiles' are enumerated only in general terms. There is specifically no mirth in contemplating a fine landscape; and even his landscape, although it has flowery meads and flocks, wears a shade of pensiveness, and contains 'russet lawns,' 'fallows grey,' and 'barren mountains' overhung with 'labouring clouds': its old turreted mansion, peeping from the trees, awakens only a train of solemn and romantic, perhaps melancholy, reflection. Many a pensive man listens with delight to the 'milk-maid singing blithe,' to the 'mower whetting his scythe,' and to a distant peal of village-bells. He chose such illustrations as minister matter for new poetry and genuine description. Even his most brilliant imagery is mellowed with the sober hues of philosophic meditation. It was impossible for the author of 'Il Penseroso' to be more cheerful or to paint mirth with levity—that is, otherwise than in the colours of the higher poetry. Both poems are the result of the same feelings and the same habits of thought."—Dr. Joseph Warton.

"Of these two exquisite little poems I think it clear that the last is the most taking,—which is owing to the subject. The mind delights most in these solemn images, and a genius delights most to paint them."—Bishop Hurd.

"They were written in the buoyancy and joyousness of youth, though the joyousness of the latter is pensive. All was yet hope with the poet; none of the evils of life had yet come upon him. It was the joy of mental display and visionary glory, of a mind proudly displaying its own riches and throwing from its treasures beams of light on all external objects; but it was the rapidity of a ferment too much in motion to allow it to wait long enough on particular topics: therefore there was in these two productions less intensity than in most of the author's other poetry: he is here generally content to describe the surface of what he notices. His learned allusions abound, though not so much, perhaps, as in most of his other writings: these, however, are not the proofs of his genius, but only of his memory and industry. I admit that the choice of the imagery of these pieces could only have been made by a true poet, of nice discernment and brilliant fancy, of a mind constantly occupied by contemplation and skilful in making use of all those superstitions in which the visionary delight, and that the whole are woven into one web of congenial association which makes a beautiful and splendid constellation: still, a large portion of the ingredients, taken separately, have been anticipated by other poets."—Sir S. Egerton Brydges.

"Exquisitely beautiful as these poems are, they still furnish a proof that Milton 'read Nature through the spectacles of books;' [see above, page 103, how his friend Diodati rallies him on this habit, note;] for we nowhere meet with that accurate description of natural objects, indicative of accurate observation, which we find in Homer, Dante, and Thomson. . . . The only objection which Johnson makes seems to be founded on his ignorance of the exact meaning of the Italian terms employed by Milton. 'I know not,' says he, 'whether the characters are kept sufficiently apart. No mirth can, indeed, be found in this melancholy; but I am afraid that I always meet some melancholy in his mirth.' But, if he had adhered to his own translation of Allegro,—cheerful,—he might have seen that mirth in its usual sense was not included in its meaning, but merely tranquil, quiet pleasure,—that, in fact, of a philosophic mind; and, if he had understood the exact meaning of Penseroso,—which he most incorrectly renders by pensive,—he would have seen that though Melancholy (la douce Mélancolie) is invoked, Il Penseroso is not by any means what we term a pensive or melancholy man."—Keightley's Life, &c. of Milton, 272, 273, 277.

"Of all the English poems in the descriptive style, the richest and most remarkable are Milton's Allegro and Penseroso. The collection of gay images on the one hand and of melancholy ones on the other, exhibited in these two small but infinitely fine poems, are as exquisite as can be conceived. They are, indeed, the storehouse whence many succeeding poets have enriched their descriptions of similar subjects; and they alone are sufficient for illustrating the observations which I made concerning the proper selection of circumstances in descriptive writing. Take, for instance, the following passage from the Penseroso:

> 'I walk unseen
> On the dry, smooth-shaven green,'
> [quotation ending with the line
> "In fire, air, flood, or under ground."] . . .

"It is a great beauty in Milton's Allegro that it is all alive and full of persons."—Blair's Lects. on Rhetoric and Belles-Lettres, Lect. XL.

"The Allegro and Penseroso are perhaps more familiar to us than any part of the writings of Milton. They satisfy the critics and they delight mankind. The choice of images is so judicious, their succession so rapid, the allusions are so various and pleasing, the leading distinction of the poems is so felicitously maintained, the versification is so animated, that we may place them at the head of that long series of descriptive poems which our language has to boast. It may be added, as in the greater part of Milton's writings, that they are sustained at an uniform pitch, with few blemishes of expression and scarce any feebleness,—a striking contrast, in this respect, to all the contemporaneous poetry, except, perhaps, that of Waller. Johnson has thought that, while there is mirth in his melancholy, he can detect some melancholy in his mirth. This seems to be too strongly put; but it may be said that his Allegro is rather cheerful than gay, and that even his cheerfulness is not always without effort. In these poems he is indebted to Fletcher, to Burton, to Browne, to Wither, and probably to more of our early versifiers; for he was a great collector of sweets from these wild flowers."—Hallam's Lit. Hist. of Europe, 4th ed., 1854, iii. 48.

"We find nowhere in his writings that whining sensibility and exaggeration of morbid feeling which makes so much of modern poetry effeminating. If he is not gay, he is not spirit-broken His L'Allegro proves that he understood thoroughly the bright and joyous aspects of nature; and in his Penseroso, where he was tempted to accumulate images of gloom, we learn that the saddest views which he took of creation are such as inspire only pensive musing or lofty contemplation."—Dr. Wm. E. Channing: Essay on the Poet. Genius of Milton.

"In none of the works of Milton is his peculiar manner more happily displayed than in the Allegro and the Penseroso. It is impossible to conceive that the mechanism of language can be brought to a more exquisite degree of perfection. These poems differ from others as atar of roses differs from ordinary rose-water, the close-packed essence from the diluted mixture. They are, indeed, not so much poems as collections of hints from each of which the reader is to make out a poem for himself. Every epithet is text for a stanza."—Lord Macaulay: Crit. and Histor. Essays, 1854, i. 13.

Respecting L'Allegro, see especially A Letter to the Rev. Mr. T. Warton on his late edition of Milton's Juvenile Poems, (ascribed to Rev. Samuel Darby, of Ipswich,) and comments on this Letter in Green's Diary of a Lover of Lit., Jan. 24th, 1800, Ipswich, 1810, 4to, 235.

Comus.

The origin of the Masque of Comus is thus related by Warton, on the authority of a MS. of Oldys's. The Earl of Bridgewater, who was in 1631 appointed Lord-President of Wales and the Marches, took up his official residence at Ludlow Castle, in Salop, in the autumn of 1634, (the year in which Milton presented his friend Lawes with the Arcades:)

"On this occasion he was attended by a large concourse of the neighbouring nobility and gentry. Among the rest came his children,—in particular, Lord Brackley, Mr. Thomas Egerton, and Lady Alice. They had been on a visit at a house of their relations, the Egerton family, in Herefordshire, and, in passing through Haywood Forest, were benighted, and the Lady Alice was even lost for a short time. This accident—which in the end was attended with no bad consequences—furnished the subject of a mask for a Michaelmas festivity, and produced Comus. Lord Bridgewater was appointed Lord-President, May 12, 1633. When the perilous adventure in Haywood Forest happened, if true, cannot now be told: it must have been soon after. The mask was acted at Michaelmas, 1634."

"We must confess," remarks Mr. Keightley, "that we certainly feel inclined to regard this tale of the Children of the Wood as somewhat apocryphal and as being founded on Comus. At all events, it must have occurred, not in 1633, but a short time before the representation of the Mask, in the prologue to which it is said,

'His fair offspring, nursed in princely lore,
And coming to attend their father's state
And new-entrusted sceptre.'

This would seem to prove that it was their first visit to Ludlow; and it is most probable that the Mask had been prepared and learned by the young actors at Harefield, and was presented by them on their arrival at Ludlow Castle.

"The origin of Comus would appear to have been as follows," &c.—Life, &c. of Milton, 279–280, q. v.

What the origin of Comus may have been is a matter of but little moment; but its exquisite—almost unearthly—beauty is so far beyond all question that he who can read it without being warmed by the most ardent admiration must (as Dr. Johnson says on another occasion) "renounce all pretensions to taste or sensibility." Thus much may we say regarding its inception, that Dryden declares, (Preface to the Fables,) "Milton has acknowledged to me that Fletcher was his original." It is not to be doubted also that the verses of Browne, Wither, Burton, Drummond, and others of this school were familiar to the great poet; but it is ever to be remembered that nothing is more groundlessly alleged, more carelessly believed, and with more difficulty disproved, than the oft-repeated charge of literary imitation. There is no branch of school-boy criticism which has been so industriously cultivated, or which is held in more general contempt by the really learned. Literary resemblances are, of course, unavoidable: they who describe the same objects must of necessity often employ the same imagery and at times very nearly the same language. To trace these resemblances in a liberal and congenial spirit is a pleasant pastime for ingenuity, and gratifies a not ignoble curiosity; but to couple passages which bear a real or supposed likeness for the sake of proving unfair imitation or criminal plagiarism is sometimes, indeed, the proper office of legitimate criticism, but more frequently the error of unconscious ignorance or the contemptible device of petty malice. But we must hasten to our citations:

"A young girl and her brothers are benighted and separated as they pass through a forest in Herefordshire. How meagre is this solitary fact! how barren a paragraph would it have made for the Herefordshire journal,—had such a journal been then in existence! Submit it to Milton, and beautiful is the form which it assumes. Then rings that wood with the jocund revelry of Comus and his company; and the maiden draws near, in the strength of unblemished chastity, and her courage waxes strong as she sees and she calls upon Echo to tell her of the flowery cave which hides her brothers, and Echo betrays her to the enchanter. Then comes the spirit from 'the starry threshold of Jove's court,' and in shepherd-weeds leads on the brothers to her rescue; and the necromancer is put to flight, but not till he has bound up the lady in fetters of stone; and Sabrina hastens from under her 'translucent wave' to dissolve the spell, and again they all three bend their happy steps back to the roof of their fathers.

'A sable cloud
Turn forth her silver lining on the night,'

"This is not extravagant rhapsody: the tale is still actually preserved, like a fly in amber. The image is a mere thing of wood; but Milton inshrines it, and it becomes an object of worship."—Robert Southey: Lon. Quar. Rev., xxxvi. 45.

Mr. Godwin adduces a number of passages in illustration of his assertion that Ben Jonson was "the predecessor whom Milton had chiefly in his eye, and whom he seems principally to resemble in his style of composition. . . . Milton will certainly be found to have studied his compositions in this kind [the lyrical portion of Jonson's Masques] more assiduously than those of any of his contemporaries. It would be strange, indeed, if the poet who in early youth composed the Masque of Comus had not frequently studied the writings of Ben Jonson."—Gifford's Jonson.

Dr. Drake remarks on the above,

"Can there be a test of merit more indisputable than this?—for Comus, though by no means faultless as a masque, has to boast of a poetry more rich and imaginative than is to be found in any other composition save The Tempest of Shakspeare."—Shakspeare and his Times, ii. 578.

Prefixed to the first edition of Milton's Poems, in 1645, were a letter from the author's friend, Henry Lawes, to "Lord-Viscount Bracly," and a letter from "Sir Henry Wootton to the Author," 13th of April, 1638. From each of these we extract a few lines:

"My Lord:

"This poem, which received its first occasion of birth from yourself and others of your noble family, and much honour from your own person in the performance, now returns again to make a finall dedication of itself to you. Although not openly acknowledged by the author, yet it is a legitimate offspring, so lovely, and so much desired, that the often copying of it hath tired my pen to give my severall friends satisfaction, and brought me to a necessity of producing it to the publike view, and now to offer it up in all rightful devotion to those fair hopes and rare endowments of your much-promising youth, which gave a full assurance, to all that knew you, of a future excellence."

"Since your going," remarks Sir Henry Wooton, "you have charged me with new obligations, both for a very kinde letter from you, dated the sixth of this month, and for a charity piece of entertainment [Comus] which came therewith,—wherein I should much commend the tragical part if the lyrical did not ravish me with a certain Dorique delicacy in your songs and odes; whereunto I must plainly confess to have seen nothing parallel in our language."

"The criticism was just," remarks Lord Macaulay. "It is when Milton escapes from the shackles of the dialogue, when he is discharged from the labour of uniting two incongruous styles, when he is at liberty to indulge his choral raptures without reserve, that he rises even above himself. Then, like his own good genius bursting from the earthly form and weeds of Thyrsis, he stands forth in celestial freedom and beauty: he seems to cry, exultingly,

'Now my task is smoothly done:
I can fly, or I can run,' to skim the earth, to soar above the clouds, to bathe in the elysian dew of the rainbow, and to inhale the balmy smells of nard and cassia which the musky winds of the zephyr scatter through the cedared alleys of the Hesperides. . . . The Comus is framed on the model of the Italian Masque, as the Samson is framed on the model of the Greek Tragedy. It is certainly the noblest performance of the kind which exists in any language. It is as far superior to the Faithful Shepherdess as the Faithful Shepherdess is to the Aminta, or the Aminta to the Pastor Fido. It was well for Milton that he had here no Euripides to mislead him. . . . Milton attended in the Comus to the distinction which he afterwards neglected in the Samson. He made his Masque what it ought to be,—essentially lyrical, and dramatic only in semblance. He has not attempted a fruitless struggle against a defect inherent in the nature of that species, and has therefore succeeded wherever success was not impossible. The speeches must be read as majestic soliloquies; and he who so reads them will be enraptured with their eloquence, their sublimity, and their music. The interruptions of the dialogue, however, impose a restraint upon the writer and break the illusion of the reader. The finest passages are those which are lyric in form as well as in spirit. I should much commend, says the excellent Sir Henry Wotton, [quotation continued above]."—Crit. and Hist. Essays, 1854, i. 15, 16, 17.

"The greatest of his juvenile performances is the 'Masque of Comus,' in which may very plainly be discovered the dawn or twilight of 'Paradise Lost.' Milton appears to have formed very early that system of diction and mode of verse which his maturer judgment approved, and from which he never endeavoured nor desired to deviate.

"Nor does 'Comus' afford only a specimen of his language: it exhibits likewise his power of description and his vigour of sentiment employed in the praise and defence of virtue. A work more truly poetical is rarely found; allusions, images, and descriptive epithets embellish almost every period with lavish decoration. As a series of lines, therefore, it may be considered as worthy of all the admiration with which the votaries have received it. As a drama it is deficient."—Johnson's Life of Milton, q. v. for the critic's objections, which, as well as his other strictures upon Milton and his works, have been ably reviewed by many dissenters.

"On the whole," remarks Dr. Thomas Warton, "whether Comus be or be not deficient as a drama, whether it is considered as an epic drama, a series of lines, a mask, or a poem, I am of opinion that Milton is here only inferior to his own 'Paradise Lost.' . . . 'Comus' is a suite of speeches, not interesting by discrimination of character, not conveying a variety of incidents nor gradually exciting curiosity, but perpetually attracting attention by sublime sentiment, by fanciful imagery of the richest vein, by an exuberance of picturesque description, poetical allusion, and ornamental expression."—Milton's Minor Poems, 263.

"It is sufficient that 'Comus' displays the true sources of poetical delight and moral instruction in its charming imagery, in its original conceptions, in its sublime diction, in its virtuous sentiments. Its few inaccuracies weigh but as dust in the balance against its general merit; and, in short, if I may be allowed respectfully to differ from the high authority of Dr. Johnson, I am of opinion that this enchanting poem, or pastoral drama, is both gracefully splendid and delightfully instructive."—TODD.

"Dr. Johnson is more inclined to be favourable to 'Comus' than to any other poem of Milton: he begins fairly enough, and gives it some of the praises which justly belong to it; but he gradually returns to his captious ill-humour, and ends with saying that it is 'inelegantly splendid and tediously instructive.' After this close, what is the value of his praise? If it is truly poetical it cannot be inelegantly splendid! Milton's decorations are never out of place in this mask: it contains not a single image or epithet which does not fill the reader of taste with delight: it contains no passion, but he did not intend it. Masks were always designed to play with the fancy; and from beginning to end, without the abatement of a single line, Milton has effected this. Such a series of rural and pastoral picturesqueness was never before brought together. . . . Comus is the invention of a beautiful fable, enriched with shadowy beings and visionary delights: every line and word is pure poetry, and the sentiments are as exquisite as the images. It is a composition which no pen but Milton's could have produced. . . . The songs of this poem are of a singular felicity: they are unbroken strains of exquisite imagery, either imaginative or descriptive, with a dance of numbers which sounds like aerial music,—for instance, the lady's song to Echo. . . . The more we study this poem the more pleasure we shall find in it: it illuminates and refines our fancy, and enables us to discover in rural scenery new delights and to distinguish the features of each object with a clearness which our own sight would not have given us: it presents to us those associations which improve our intellect and spiritualize the material joys of our senses. The effect of poetical language is to convey a sort of internal lustre which puts the mind in a blaze: it is like bringing a bright lamp to a dark chamber. . . . It is worthy of remark with what admirable skill the poet gathered from all his predecessors—Spenser, Shakspeare, Beaumont and Fletcher, Drayton, and twenty more—every happy adjective of description and imaginative force, and combined them into the texture of his own fiction. As his power of creation was great, so was his memory both exact and abundant: whatever he borrowed he made new by the fervent power of amalgamation."—SIR S. EGERTON BRYDGES.

"Milton's 'Comus' is, I think, one of the finest productions of modern times; and I do not know whether to admire most the poetry of it or the philosophy, which is of the noblest kind. The subject of it I like better than that of his 'Paradise Lost,' which, I think, is not human enough to touch the common feelings of humanity as poetry ought to do; the divine personages he has introduced are of too high a kind to act any part in poetry, and the scene of the action is for the greater part quite out of nature: but the subject of the 'Comus' is a fine mythological tale, marvellous enough,—as all poetical subjects should be,—but at the same time human. He begins his piece in the manner of Euripides; and the descending Spirit that prologuises makes the finest and grandest opening of any theatrical piece that I know, ancient or modern. The conduct of the piece is answerable to the beginning, and the versification of it is finely varied by short and long verses, blank and rhyming, and the sweetest songs that ever were composed. As to the style of 'Comus,' it is more elevated, I think, than that of any of his writings, and so much above what is written at present, that I am inclined to make the same distinction in the English language that Homer made of the Greek in his time, and to say that Milton's language is the language of the gods, whereas we of this age speak and write the language of mere mortal men."—LORD MONBODDO.

"In poetical and picturesque circumstances, in wildness of fancy and imagery, and in weight of sentiment and moral, how greatly does 'Comus' excel the 'Aminta' of Tasso and the 'Pastor Fide' of Guarini, which Milton, from his love of Italian poetry, must frequently have read! 'Comus,' like these two, is a pastoral drama; and I have often wondered it is not mentioned as such."

"It has all the buoyancy and vivacity of youth; it is full of the high aspirings, the splendid imaginings, the outpourings of a poetical spirit before it was soured by disappointment, or fevered by criticism, or embittered by political or polemical controversy."—Henry Neele's Lects. on Eng. Poetry, Lect. IV.

"Milton's 'Comus' is, in my judgment, the most beautiful and perfect of that sublime genius."—WAKEFIELD.

"Comus was sufficient to convince any one of taste and feeling that a great poet had arisen in England, and one partly formed in a different school from his contemporaries. Many of them had produced highly beautiful and imaginative passages; but none had evinced so classical a judgment, none had aspired to so regular a perfection. Jonson had learned much from the ancients; but there was a grace in their best models which he did not quite attain. Neither his Sad Shepherd, nor the Faithful Shepherdess of Fletcher, have the elegance or dignity of Comus. A noble virgin and her young brothers, by whom this masque was originally represented, [the Lady Alice Egerton, the Lord Brackley, Mr. Thomas Egerton, his brother,] required an elevation, a purity, a sort of severity of sentiment, whom no one in that age could have given but Milton. He avoided, and nothing loth, the more festive notes which dramatic poetry was wont to mingle with its serious strain; but for this he compensated by the brightest hues of fancy and the sweetest melody of song. In Comus we find nothing prosaic or feeble, no false taste in the incidents and not much in the language, nothing over which we should desire to pass in a second perusal. The want of what we call personality,—none of the characters having names except Comus himself, who is a very indefinite being,—and the absence of all positive attributes of time and place, enhance the ideality of the fiction by a certain indistinctness not unpleasing to the imagination."—Hallam's Lit. Hist. of Europe, 4th ed., 1854, iii. 46.

"What sensibility breathes in the descriptions of the benighted lady's singing by Comus and the Spirit!"—Channing's Essay on the Poetical Genius of Milton.

"The moral of this poem is, indeed, very finely summed up in the six concluding lines; in which, to wind up one of the most elegant productions of his genius, 'the poet's eye,' in a fine frenzy rolling, threw up its last glance to heaven, in rapt contemplation of that stupendous mystery whereby He, the lofty theme of 'Paradise Regained,' stooping from above all height, 'bowed the heavens and came down' on earth, to atone as man for the sins of man, to strengthen feeble virtue by the influence of his grace, and to teach her to ascend his throne."—REV. FRANCIS HENRY EGERTON, afterwards Earl of Bridgewater.

"In Comus, the Allegro and Penseroso, and the religious odes, we see all this power of the imagination operating, but producing only beautiful and holy forms; we are entertained with the sight of nature suffused with heavenly light, with the discourse of bright and spiritual beings, and with the view of past scenes over which hangs the cloud of divine glory. All here was fresh and springlike. The poet's imagination was a bird of Paradise, that had not strength of wing to explore the dark world beyond it. . . . The versification of his shorter poems is the most beautiful specimen we possess of the music of our language."—REV. HENRY STEBBING.

"Milton's 'Juvenile Poems' are so no otherwise than as they were written in his younger years: for their dignity and excellence they are sufficient to have set him among the most celebrated of the poets, even of the ancients themselves: his 'Mask' and 'Lycidas' are, perhaps, superior to all in their several kinds."—JONATHAN RICHARDSON.

LYCIDAS.

This is a monody, written in November, 1637, which first appeared in a Cambridge collection of verses, 1638, 4to, on the death of Edward King, Fellow of Christ's College, who was drowned in his passage from Chester on the Irish seas, August 10, 1637. All on board the vessel found a watery grave. King was twenty-five years of age,—was distinguished for his piety and learning, and greatly lamented by his college-companions, among whom was Milton. The volume referred to contains three Greek, nineteen Latin, and thirteen English poems. For no part of his critical writings has Johnson been so much censured as for his strictures on this poem: he will allow it no merit of any kind, and is not at any pains to conceal the vehement disgust which accompanies every stroke of his pen.

"One of the poems," he commences, "on which much praise has been bestowed, is 'Lycidas,' of which the diction is harsh, the rhymes uncertain, and the numbers unpleasing. What beauty there is we must, therefore, seek in the sentiments and images. It is not to be considered as the effusion of real passion; for passion runs not after remote allusions and obscure opinions. Passion plucks no berries from the myrtle and ivy, nor calls upon Arethuse and Mincius, nor tells of rough satyrs and fauns with cloven heel. Where there is leisure for fiction there is little grief.

"In this poem there is no nature, for there is nothing new. Its form is that of a pastoral,—easy, vulgar, and therefore disgusting: whatever images it can supply are long ago exhausted, and its inherent improbability always forces dissatisfaction on the mind. . . . This poem has yet a grosser fault. With these trifling fictions are mingled the most awful and sacred truths, such as ought never to be polluted with such irreverend combinations. The shepherd, likewise, is now a feeder of sheep, and afterwards an ecclesiastical pastor, a superintendent of a Christian flock. Such equivocations are always unskilful; but here they are indecent, and at least approach to impiety,—of which, however, I believe the writer not to have been conscious.

"Such is the power of reputation justly acquired, that its blaze drives away the eye from nice examination. Surely no man could have fancied that he read 'Lycidas' with pleasure had he not known its author."—Life of Milton.

"It has been said that this is not the natural mode of expressing passion; that where it is real its language is less figurative; and that 'where there is leisure for fiction there is little grief.' In general, this may be true; in the case of Milton, its truth may be doubted. . . . The mind of Milton was perfect fairy-land; and every thought which entered into it, whether grave or gay, magnificent or mean, quickly partook of a fairy form. . . . There is no universal language of grief. It takes its complexion from the country, the age, the individual. In its paroxysms no one thinks of writing verses of any kind; then the rhymes of a ballad-singer would be as much out of place as the strains of a Theocritus. We exclaim, as King David does, 'My son! my son!' When the paroxysm is past, every man will write such verses (if he write them at all) as the ordinary turn of his mind dictates. Bishop Andrews said his prayers in Greek: who would on that account doubt the sincerity of the great scholar's devotion? Milton lamented his friend in the language of romance: who would on that account deny that the poet's sorrow was unfeigned? Men act and speak under suffering agreeably to the manner in which they act and speak in general. Cicero was, by habit, a reader and writer of philosophy; and therefore, when his daughter dies, he gives vent to his grief by studying philosophical treatises on that affection of the mind. Marmontel was, by habit, a reader and writer of plays; and therefore, when he loses his favourite child and witnesses the affliction of his wife, he betakes himself to composing—(so he tells us) as an analogous subject—the opera of Penelope. The one acted like a Roman, the other like a Frenchman; yet the distress of both parents was, no doubt, sincere."—ROBERT SOUTHEY: Lon. Quar. Rev., xxxvi. 46–47.

"In this piece there is, perhaps, more poetry than sorrow; but let us read it for its poetry. It is true that 'passion plucks no berries from the myrtle and ivy, nor calls upon Arethuse and Mincius, nor tells of rough satyrs with cloven heel;' but poetry does this, and, in the hands of Milton, does it with a peculiar and irresistible charm. Subordinate poets exercise no invention when they tell how a shepherd has lost his companion, and must feed his flocks alone, without any judge of his skill in piping; but Milton dignifies and adorns these common artificial incidents with unexpected touches of picturesque beauty, with the grace of sentiment, and with the novelties of original genius. It is objected, 'Here is no art; for there is nothing new.' To say nothing that there may be art without novelty, as well as novelty without art, I must reply that this objection will vanish if we consider the imagery which Milton has raised from local circumstances."—THOMAS WARTON.

"The rhymes and numbers which Dr. Johnson condemns appear to me as eminent proofs of the poet's judgment, exhibiting, in their varied and arbitrary disposition, an ease and gracefulness which infinitely exceed the formal couplets or alternate rhymes of modern elegy. Lamenting also the prejudice which has pronounced 'Lycidas' to be vulgar and disgusting, I shall never cease to consider this monody as the sweet effusion of a most poetic and tender mind,—entitled, as well by its beautiful melody as by the frequent grandeur of its sentiments and language, to the utmost enthusiasm of admiration."—TODD.

"Of all Milton's smaller poems, Lycidas is the greatest favourite with me. I cannot agree to the charge which Dr. Johnson has brought against it of pedantry and want of feeling. It is the first emanation of classical sentiment in a youthful scholar,—'most musical, most melancholy!' A certain tender gloom overspreads it, a wayward abstraction, a forgetfulness of his subject in the serious reflections that arise out of it. The gusts of passion come and go like the sounds of music borne on the wind. The loss of the friend whose death he laments seems to have recalled, with double force, the reality of those speculations which they had indulged together; we are transported to classic ground, and a mysterious strain steals responsive on the ear while we listen to the poet

'with eager thought warbling his Doric lay.'

. . . The passage which alludes to the clerical character of Lycidas has been found fault with, as combining the truths of the Christian religion with the fiction of the heathen. I conceive there is very little foundation for this objection, either in reason or in good taste. . . . Dr. Johnson's general remark, that Milton's genius had not room to show itself in his smaller pieces, is not well founded. Not to mention Lycidas, the Allegro and Penseroso, it proceeds in a false estimate of the merits of his great work, which is not more distinguished by strength and sublimity than by tenderness and beauty. The last were as essential qualities of Milton's mind as the first."—Hazlitt's Lects. on the English Poets, Appendix.

"Whatever stern grandeur Milton's two epics and his drama—written in his latter days—exhibit, by whatever divine invention they are created, 'Lycidas' and 'Comus' have a fluency, a sweetness, a melody, a youthful freshness, a dewy brightness of description, which those gigantic poems have not. It is true that 'Lycidas' has no deep grief; its clouds of sorrow are everywhere pierced by golden rays of a splendid and joyous imagination; the ingredients are all poetical, even to single words; the epithets are all picturesque and fresh; and the whole are combined into a splendid tissue, as new in their position as they are radiant in their union. The unexpected transitions from one to the other at once surprise and delight: they are like the heavens of an autumnal evening when they are lighted up by electric flames. The contrasts of sorrow, and hope, and glory, keep us in a state of mingled excitement to the end; the imagery never flags, though it blazes with the most beautiful forms of inanimate nature and all sorts of pastoral pictures; yet the whole are, by some spell or other, made intellectual and spirited: they do not play merely upon the mirror of his fancy.

"The prime charm of poetry—the rapidity and the novelty yet the natural association of beautiful ideas—is pre-eminently exhibited in 'Lycidas,' where the sudden transitions to contrasted images and sentiments keep the mind in a state of delightful ferment,

'And o'er the cheek of sorrow throw
A melancholy grace.'

It strikes me that there is no poem of Milton in which the pastoral and rural imagery is so breathing, so brilliant, and so new as in this: the tone which has most similitude to it is that of some descriptive passages of Shakspeare, whose simple brightness and modulation of words seem always to have dwelt on Milton's memory and ear.

"But, though strength was Milton's characteristic, there are many passages, turns of thought and expression, in this poem, which are not wanting in tenderness, in pathetic recollections and tearful sighs,—in that sort of grief which belongs to true poetry,—in grief neither factitious nor gloomy, but genuine though hopeful, and mingled with rays of light though melancholy. But I must forbear to say more on this exquisite and inimitable elegy, lest those remarks should run to an extent disproportioned to its length."—SIR S. EGERTON BRYDGES.

"Addison says that he who desires to know whether he has a true taste for history or not should consider whether he is pleased with Livy's manner of telling a story: so, perhaps, it may be said that he who wishes to know whether he has a true taste for poetry or not should consider whether he is truly delighted or not with the perusal of Milton's 'Lycidas.' If I might venture to place Milton's works according to their degrees of poetic excellence, it should be, perhaps, in the following order: Paradise Lost, Comus, Samson Agonistes, Lycidas, L'Allegro, Il Penseroso. The last three are in such an exquisite strain, says Fenton, that, though he had left no other monuments of his genius behind him, his name had been immortal."—JOSEPH WARTON.

"It has been said, I think very fairly, that Lycidas is a good test of a real feeling for what is peculiarly called poetry. Many—or perhaps we might say most—readers do not taste its excellence; nor does it follow that they may not greatly admire Pope and Dryden, or even Virgil and Homer. It is, however, somewhat remarkable that Johnson, who has committed his critical reputation by the most contemptuous depreciation of this poem, had, in an earlier part of his life, selected the tenth eclogue of Virgil for peculiar praise; [see The Adventurer, No. 92;] the tenth eclogue, which, beautiful as it is, belongs to the same class of pastoral and personal allegory, and requires the same sacrifice of reasoning criticism, as the Lycidas itself. . . . Whatever is obviously incongruous, whatever shocks our previous knowledge of possibility, destroys to a certain extent that acquiescence in the fiction which it is the true business of the fiction to produce. But the case is not the same in such poems as Lycidas. They pretend to no credibility; they aim at no illusion; they are read with the willing abandonment of the imagination to a waking dream, and require only that general possibility, that combination of images, which common experience does not reject as incompatible, without which the fancy of the poet would be only like that of the lunatic. And it had been so usual to blend sacred with mythological personages in allegory, that no one probably in Milton's age would have been struck by the objection."—Hallam's Lit. Hist. of Europe, 4th ed., 1854, iii. 47, 48.

"Lycidas,—though highly poetical—I agree, with Johnson, breathes little sincere sorrow, and is therefore essentially defective as a Monody."—Green's Diary of a Lover of Lit., March 8th, 1779, Ipswich, 1810, 4to, 126.

"The particular beauties of this charming pastoral are too striking to need much descanting on; but what gives the greatest grace to the whole is that natural and agreeable wildness and irregularity which run quite through it, than which nothing could be better suited to express the warm affection which Milton had for his friend, and the extreme grief he was in for the loss of him. Grief is eloquent, but not formal."—THYER.

"The previous rhyme in Milton's 'Lycidas' is very frequently placed at such a distance from the following that it is often dropt by the memory (much better employed in attending to the sentiment) before it be brought to join its partner; and this seems to be the greatest objection to that kind of versification. But then the peculiar ease and variety it admits of are no doubt sufficient to overbalance the objection and give it the preference to any other in an elegy of length."—SHENSTONE: Pref. to Essay on Elegy.

SAMSON AGONISTES.

"The nephew of Milton [Phillips] has told us that he could not ascertain the time when this drama was written; but it probably flowed from the heart of the indignant poet soon after his spirit had been wounded by the calamitous destiny of his friends, to which he alludes with so much energy and pathos in the chorus, line 652, &c. He did not design the drama for a theatre, nor has it the kind of action requisite for theatrical interest; but in one point of view the 'Samson Agonistes' is the most singularly affecting composition that was ever produced by sensibility of heart and vigour of imagination. To give it this particular effect we must remember that the lot of Milton had a marvellous coincidence with that of his hero in three remarkable points: first, (but we should regard this as the most inconsiderable article of resemblance,) he had been tormented by a beautiful but disaffectionate and disobedient wife; secondly, he had been the great champion of his country, and, as such, the idol of public admiration; lastly, he had fallen from that height of unrivalled glory and had experienced the most humiliating reverse of fortune. In delineating the greater part of Samson's sensations under calamity he had only to describe his own. No dramatist can have ever conformed so literally to the Horatian precept, Si vis me flere, &c.,—'If you wish me to weep, you must first weep yourself;' and if in reading the 'Samson Agonistes' we observe how many passages, expressed with the most energetic sensibility, exhibit to our fancy the sufferings and real sentiments of the poet, as well as those of his hero, we may derive from this extraordinary composition a kind of pathetic delight that no other drama can afford: we may applaud the felicity of genius that contrived in this manner to relieve a heart overburdened with anguish and indignation, and to pay a half-concealed yet hallowed tribute to the memories of dear though dishonoured friends, whom the state of the times allowed not the afflicted poet more openly to deplore."—HAYLEY.

"'Samson Agonistes' is the only tragedy that Milton finished, though he sketched out the plans of several, and proposed the subjects of more, in his manuscript preserved in Trinity College, Cambridge: and we may suppose that he was determined to the choice of this particular subject by the similitude of his own circumstances to those of Samson—blind, and among the Philistines. This I conceive to be the last of his poetical pieces; and it is written in the very spirit of the ancients, and equals, if not exceeds, any of the most perfect tragedies which were ever exhibited on the Athenian stage when Greece was in its glory. As this work was never intended for the stage, the division into acts and scenes is omitted. Bishop Atterbury had an intention of getting Pope to divide it into acts and scenes, and of having it acted at Westminster; but his commitment to the Tower put an end to that design. It has since been brought upon the stage in the form of an oratorio; and Handel's music is never employed to greater advantage than when it is adapted to Milton's words. That great artist has done equal justice to our author's L'Allegro and Il Penseroso,—as if the same spirit possessed both masters, and as if the god of music and of verse was still one and the same."—BISHOP NEWTON.

"The excellence of this drama, which strictly follows the Greek model, lies principally in its majestic moral strength: the two preceding poems [Paradise Lost and Paradise Regained] are divine epics; this deals entirely in topics of human nature and human manners. It is not adapted to exhibition on the stage: it is too didactic, and has too few actors and too few incidents. The fable, the characters, the sentiments, and the language are all admirably preserved: the story does not linger, as some have pretended, but goes forward with intense interest to the end. The opening is in the chastest style of poetical beauty. 'The breath of heaven fresh-blowing' gives ease to Samson's body, but not to his mind, which, when in solitude and at leisure, agonizes his heart with regrets. Nothing can be more pathetic than the comparison of his present fallen state with his early hopes and past glories; and then the reflection that for this change he had no one to blame but himself. . . . The observations of the Chorus, descriptive of Samson's dejected appearance in this situation, are very fine, contrasted with the recollection of his former mighty actions and triumphs. . . . The dialogues between Samson and his father are everywhere supported with force, elevation, and moral wisdom; and the unexampled simplicity of the language in which they are conveyed augments the deep impression which they everywhere make.

"Perhaps, as a summary of divine dispensations, nothing even in Milton can be found so awful and comprehensive. Then bursts forth, at line 667, that complaint of most deep and stupendous eloquence, beginning,

'God of our fathers, what is man?'

"Then enters Dalilah, with the renewal of all her arts and coquetries and false smiles. With what a proud and overwhelming scorn does the hero treat her insidious advances! What a contrast is Dalilah to Eve, even when, like Eve to Adam, she affects to own her transgression! . . . As the dialogue goes on, each party speaks in that natural strain which leads to the consummation of the tragedy, and with a poetic force and plenitude of rich sentiment which belong to Milton alone.

"All poetry of a high order is produced by a union of all the best faculties of the mind and all the noblest emotions of the heart. What is called the understanding or reason alone will produce no poetry at all: even the imagination added to it will not be sufficient unless there be sentiment and pathos raised by what imagination presents. To supply the materials of that imagination there must be observation, knowledge, learning, and memory. In the amalgamation of all these Milton's drama excels.

"The character of Samson Agonistes is magnificently supported. He speaks always in a tone becoming his circumstances, his position, his sufferings, and his destiny: every thing is grand, animated, natural, and soul-elating. . . . The character of Manoah, Samson's father, is nature and parental affection. The Chorus is everywhere attractive,—by poetry, moral wisdom, and eloquent pathos. I will not disguise my opinion that the versification of these lyrical parts is occasionally—and only occasionally—inharmonious, abrupt, and harsh, and such as my ear can scarcely reconcile to any sort of metre. . . . The sudden presage which prompted Samson to consent to exhibit himself in the theatre, after the stern reluctance he had previously exhibited, is very sublime. The tone of the whole drama is in the highest degree of elevation: the thoughts, sentiments, and words are those of a mental giant. Added to the mighty interest which these create is the conviction that through the whole the poet has a relation to his own case,—his blindness, his proscription, his poverty, his fortitude, his defiance, his unimpaired strength, his loftiness of soul, his conscious power from the vastness of his intellect and the firmness of his principles."—Sir S. Egerton Brydges.

'With darkness and with danger compass'd round,'

"The utmost severity of thought and diction is observable in this drama. There are no vagaries of fancy, no symptoms of an unbridled imagination. In thought, expression, sentiment, it is Greek, Attic Greek,—tinged, however, with that solemn and unearthly character which it derives from the sacred nature of its subject. Both dramas [Samson and Comus] are worthy of the author of 'Paradise Lost.'"—Henry Neele's Lects. on Eng. Poetry, Lect. IV.

"The tragedy of 'Samson' breathes all the energy and simplicity of the antique The poet himself is depicted in the person of the Israelite,—blind, a prisoner, and unfortunate. A noble way of revenging himself on his age."—Chateaubriand's Sketches of Eng. Lit., 1837, ii. 106.

"We have always regarded this as a noble poem, the swan-song of a mighty genius. In the eye of criticism free from pedantry, its defects must, we should think, be hardly appreciable. Throughout it has the force and dignity of Æschylus, and at times it exhibits the majesty and sweetness of Sophocles. Had Milton flourished in ancient Attica, he had surely ranked with these mighty poets, milder and sweeter than the former, grander and more elevated than the latter."—Keightley's Life, &c. of Milton, 324.

And see his comments on (325–326) the strictures of Johnson, Hallam, and Cumberland, (quoted post.)

"If 'Paradise Regained' has been too much depreciated, 'Samson Agonistes' has, in requital, been too much admired. It could only be by long prejudice and the bigotry of learning that Milton could prefer the ancient tragedies, with the encumbrance of a chorus, to the exhibitions of the French and English stages; and it is only by a blind confidence in the reputation of Milton that a drama can be praised in which the intermediate parts have neither cause nor consequence, neither hasten nor retard the catastrophe

"In this tragedy are, however, many particular beauties, many just sentiments and striking lines; but it wants that power of attracting the attention which a well-connected plan produces."—Johnson's Life of Milton.

"Milton, it is well known, admired Euripides highly,—much more highly than, in our opinion, Euripides deserved. Indeed, the caresses which this partiality leads our countryman to bestow on 'sad Electra's poet' sometimes remind us of the beautiful Queen of Fairy-Land kissing the long ears of Bottom. At all events, there can be no doubt that this veneration for the Athenian, whether just or not, was injurious to the Samson Agonistes. . . . We are by no means insensible to the merits of this celebrated piece, to the severe dignity of the style, the graceful and pathetic solemnity of the opening speech, or the wild and barbaric melody which gives so striking an effect to the choral passages; but we think it, we confess, the least successful effort of the genius of Milton."—Lord Macaulay: Crit. and Histor. Essays, 1854, i. 15.

"Read Milton's Samson Agonistes.—a noble Poem, but a miserable Drama. Comus, though a much earlier, is surely a much finer, composition. After all, however, give me the Gothic Architecture of Shakspeare."—Green's Diary of a Lover of Lit., March 8th, 1799, Ipswich, 1810, 4to, 126.

"In some places it is no measure at all, or such, at least, as the ear will not patiently endure, nor which any recitations can make harmonious."—Cumberland: Observer, No. 76.

"Samson Agonistes is the latest of Milton's poems: we see in it, perhaps more distinctly than in Paradise Regained, the ebb of a mighty tide. An air of uncommon grandeur prevails throughout, but the language is less poetical than in Paradise Lost; the vigour of thought remains, but it wants much of its ancient eloquence. Nor is the lyric tone well kept up by the chorus; they are too sententious, too slow in movement, and, except by the metre, are not easily distinguishable from the other personages. But this metre is itself infelicitous: the lines, being frequently of a number of syllables not recognized in the usage of English poetry, and destitute of rhythmical measure, fall into prose. Milton seems to have forgotten that the ancient chorus had a musical accompaniment. . . . It is, perhaps, not very popular even with the lovers of poetry; yet, upon close comparison, we should find that it deserves a higher place than many of its prototypes. We might search the Greek tragedies long for a character so powerfully conceived and maintained as that of Samson himself; and it is but conformable to the sculptural simplicity of that form of drama which Milton adopted that all the rest shou. ' be kept in subordination to it."—Hallam's Lit. Hist. of Europe, 4th ed., 1854, iii. 481–482.

On the Morning of Christ's Nativity.

"When it is recollected that this piece was produced by the author at the age of twenty-one, all deep thinkers of fancy and sensibility must pore upon it with delighted wonder. The vigour, the grandeur, the imaginativeness of the conception, the force and maturity of language, the bound, the gathering strength, the thundering roll of the metre, the largeness of the views, the extent of the learning, the solemn and awful tones, the enthusiasm and a certain spell in the epithets, which puts the reader into a state of mysterious excitement, may be better felt than described. . . . There is no doubt that the prima stamina of the bard's divine epics are exhibited in this poem; but it has several peculiarities which distinguish it from the poet's other compositions: it is more truly lyrical; the stanza is beautifully constructed; and there is a solemnity, a grandeur, and a swell of verse which is magical. . . . I venture to pronounce this poem far superior to the 'L'Allegro' and 'Il Penseroso,' though the popular taste may not concur with me: it is much deeper, much more original, and of a nobler cast of materials."—Sir S. Egerton Brydges.

"Italy and Spain were already in possession of splendid lyric poetry; but England had as yet, unless we except Spenser's Hymns to Love and Beauty, and his nuptial verses, nothing of the kind to produce beyond short songs, and this remained the solitary specimen of the high lyric poetry till Dryden arose. We offer no particular criticism on it, for it is, in effect, nearly all beauty."—Keightley's Life, &c. of Milton, 261, 262.

Mr. Keightley is very indignant at Dr. Thomas Warton's contemptuous notice of this admirable Ode.

"The Ode on the Nativity, far less popular than most of the poetry of Milton, is perhaps the finest in the English language. A grandeur, a simplicity, a breadth of manner, an imagination at once elevated and restrained by the subject, reign throughout it. If Pindar is a model of lyric poetry, it would be hard to name any other ode so truly Pindaric. Of the other short poems, that on the death of the Marchioness of Westminster deserves particular mention. It is a pity that the first lines are bad and the last much worse; for rarely can we find more feeling and beauty than in some other passages."—Hallam's Lit. Hist. of Europe, 4th ed., 1854, iii. 48. See also 34, n.

Sonnets.

"The 'Sonnets' were written in different parts of Milton's life, upon different occasions. They deserve not any particular criticism; for of the best it can only be said that they are not bad; and perhaps the eighth and twenty-first are truly entitled to this slender commendation. The fabric of a sonnet, however adapted to the Italian language, has never succeeded in ours, which, having greater variety of termination, requires the rhymes to be often changed. Those little pieces may be despatched without much anxiety."—Johnson's Life of Milton.

"Mrs. Kennicott related in his [Johnson's] presence a lively saying of Dr. Johnson to Miss Hannah More, who had expressed a wonder that the poet who had written 'Paradise Lost' should write such poor sonnets: 'Milton, madam, was a genius that could cut a Colossus from a rock but could not carve heads upon cherry-stones.'"—Croker's Boswell's Johnson, 1848, r. 8vo, 765.

"The Sonnets of Milton have obtained of late years the admiration of all real lovers of poetry. Johnson has been impotent to fix the public taste in this instance, as in his other criticisms on the smaller poems of the author of Paradise Lost. These Sonnets are indeed unequal: the expression is sometimes harsh, and sometimes obscure; sometimes too much of pedantic allusion interferes with the sentiment; nor am I reconciled to his frequent deviations from the best Italian structure. But such blemishes are lost in the majestic simplicity, the holy calm, that ennoble many of these short compositions."—Hallam's Lit. Hist. of Europe, 4th ed., 1854, iii. 48–49.

"If it can be shown that in any one of these Sonnets of Milton there is not much sterling ore, I will give it up. In all there is some important thought or opinion or sentiment developed. The modulation may sometimes appear rough to delicate and sickly ears; and there is not the nice polish of a lady's gem come from a refining jeweller's workshop: it is all massy gold,—not filagreed away into petty ornaments. The Sonnet on Cromwell is majestic; on his blindness, sublime; on his twenty-second birthday, both pathetic and exalted; others are moral and axiomatic, and others descriptive. . . . The question at present is not whether the Sonnets are equal to Milton's genius, but whether they are good, or as contemptible as Johnson makes them. I say that they are such as none but Milton could have written: they are full of lofty thought, moral instruction, and virtuous sentiment, expressed in language as strong as it is plain. They are pictures of a manly, resolute, inflexible spirit, and aid us in our knowledge of the poet's individual character; and, if any one can read them without both pleasurable excitation and improvement, he has a sort of mind which it would be vain to attempt to cultivate,—a barren soil, or one overgrown with weeds and prejudices. . . . Of all the Sonnets of Milton, I am most inclined to prefer that 'On his Blindness.' It has, to my weak taste, such various excellencies as I am unequal to praise sufficiently. It breathes doctrines at once so divine and consolatory as to gild the gloomy paths of our existence here with a new and singular light."—Sir S. Egerton Brydges.

"Milton's sonnets are, in easy majesty and severe beauty, unequalled by any other compositions of the kind."—Rev. Alexander Dyce.

"Traces, indeed, of the peculiar character of Milton may be found in all his works; but it is most strongly displayed in the Sonnets. Those remarkable poems have been undervalued by critics who have not understood their nature. They have no epigrammatic point. There is none of the ingenuity of Filicaja in the thought, none of the hard and brilliant enamel of Petrarch in the style. They are simple but majestic records of the feelings of the poet, as little tricked out for the public eye as his diary would have been. A victory, an expected attack upon the city, a momentary fit of depression or exultation, a jest thrown out against one of his books, a dream which for a short time restored to him that beautiful face over which the grave had closed forever, led him to musings which, without effort, shaped themselves into verse. The unity of sentiment and severity of style which characterise these little pieces remind us of the Greek Anthology, or perhaps still more of the Collects of the English Liturgy. The noble poem on the massacres of Piedmont is strictly a Collect in verse.

"The Sonnets are more or less striking according as the occasions which gave birth to them are more or less interesting. But they are, almost without exception, dignified by a sobriety and greatness of mind to which we know not where to look for a parallel."—Lord Macaulay: Crit. and Histor. Essays, 1854, i. 28–29.

The celebrated "Trinity Manuscript," as it is called, bequeathed to the Library of Trinity College, Cambridge, by Sir Henry Newton Puckering, contains Arcades, Comus, Lycidas, Ode on Circumcision, At a Solemn Music, On Time, and seven Sonnets in Milton's own hand, and six Sonnets in different female hands. It contains also a copious list of subjects for the drama, and two copies of a letter written at Cambridge in November, 1631, in Milton's handwriting. See Warton's ed. of Milton's Poems, 2d ed., and Keightley's Life, &c. of Milton, 266–267.

Latin Poems.

"I once heard Mr. Hampton, the translator of Polybius, remark—what I think is true—that Milton was the first Englishman who, after the revival of letters, wrote Latin verses with classic elegance. If any exceptions can be made, they are very few. Haddon and Ascham, the pride of Elizabeth's reign, however they have succeeded in prose, no sooner attempt verses than they provoke derision. If we produced any thing worthy of notice before the elegies of Milton, it was perhaps Alabaster's Roxana."—Johnson's Life of Milton.

"But we must at least except some of the hendecasyllabics and epigrams of Leland, one of our first literary reformers, from this hasty decision [Thomas Warton]. Whoever but slightly examines Alabaster's Roxana [published 1632] will find it written in the style and manner of the turgid and unnatural Seneca [Joseph Warton]." See Thomas Warton's ed of Milton's Minor Poems.

"Small as is the portion of glory which accrues to Milton from his Latin poetry, there are single sentences of it—aye, single images—worth all that our island had produced before. In all the volume of Buchanan I doubt whether you can discover a glimpse of poetry; and few sparks fly off the anvil of May."—W. S. Landor.

"Many of the Latin poems of Milton were written in early life, some even at the age of seventeen. His name, and the just curiosity of mankind to trace the development of a mighty genius, would naturally attract our regard. They are in themselves full of classical elegance, of thoughts natural and living, of a diction culled with taste from the gardens of ancient poetry, of a versification remarkably well cadenced and grateful to the ear. There is in them a marked originality, which Latin verse can rarely admit but at the price of some incorrectness or impropriety,—a more individual display of the poet's mind than we usually find. 'In the elegies,' it is said by Warton, a very competent judge of Latin poetry, 'Ovid was professedly Milton's model for language and versification. They are not, however, a perpetual and uniform tissue of Ovidian phraseology. With Ovid in view, he has an original manner and character of his own, which exhibit a remarkable perspicuity of contexture, a native facility and fluency. Nor does his observation of Roman models oppress or destroy our great poet's inherent powers of invention and sentiment. I value these pieces as much for their fancy and genius as for their style and expression. That Ovid, among the Latin poets, was Milton's favourite, appears not only from his elegiac but his hexametric poetry. The versification of our author's hexameters has yet a different structure from that of the Metamorphoses: Milton's is more clear, intelligible, and flowing; less desultory, less familiar, and less embarrassed, with a frequent recurrence of periods. Ovid is at once rapid and abrupt.' [Warton's essay on the Latin poetry of Milton, inserted at length in Todd's edition.] Why Warton should have at once supposed Ovid to be Milton's favourite model in hexameters, and yet so totally different as he represents him to be, seems hard to say. The structure of our poet's hexameters is much more Virgilian; nor do I see the least resemblance in them to the manner of Ovid. These Latin poems of Milton bear some traces of juvenility, but, for the most part, such as please us for that very reason. It is the spring-time of that ardent and brilliant fancy, before the stern and sour spirit of polemical puritanism had gained entrance into his mind,—the voice of the Allegro and of Comus. . . . England might justly boast, in the earlier part of the century, her Milton: nay, I do not know that, with the exception of a well-known and very pleasing poem, though perhaps hardly of classical simplicity, by Cowley on himself, Epitaphium Vivi Auctoris, we can produce any thing equally good in this period."—Hallam's Lit. Hist. of Europe, 4th ed., 1854, iii. 55–56, 493.

"He was perhaps the only great poet of later times who has been distinguished for the excellence of his Latin verse. The genius of Petrarch was scarcely of the first order; and his poems in the ancient language, though most praised by those who have never read them, are wretched compositions. Cowley, with all his admirable wit and ingenuity, had little imagination; nor, indeed, do we think his classical diction comparable to that of Milton. The authority of Johnson is against us on this point. But Johnson had studied the bad writers of the Middle Ages till he had become utterly insensible to the Augustan elegance, and was as ill qualified to judge between two Latin styles as a habitual drunkard to set up for a wine-taster. Versification in a dead language is an exotic,—a far-fetched, costly, sickly imitation of that which elsewhere may be found in healthful and spontaneous perfection. The soils on which this rarity flourishes are in general as ill suited to the production of vigorous native poetry as the flower-pots of a hot-house to the growth of oaks. That the author of the Paradise Lost should have written the Epistle to Manso [vide p. 1297, ante] was truly wonderful. Never before were such marked originality and such exquisite mimicry found together. Indeed, in all the Latin poems of Milton, the artificial manner indispensable to such works is admirably preserved, while, at the same time, his genius gives to them a peculiar charm, an air of nobleness and freedom which distinguishes them from all other writings of the same class. They remind us of the amusements of those angelic warriors who composed the cohort of Gabriel:

> 'About him exercised heroic games
> The unarmed youth of heaven. But o'er their heads
> Celestial armoury, shield, helm, and spear,
> Hung high, with diamond flaming and with gold.'

"We cannot look upon the sportive exercises for which the genius of Milton ungirds itself, without catching a glimpse of the gorgeous and terrible panoply which it is accustomed to wear. The strength of his imagination triumphed over every obstacle. So intense and ardent was the fire of his mind that it not only was not suffocated beneath the weight of fuel, but penetrated the whole superincumbent mass with its own heat and radiance."—Lord Macaulay: Crit. and Hist. Essays, 1854, i. 9–11.

"Look at Milton's lines on the deaths of the Bishops of Winchester and Ely, and compare them with those on the Marchioness of Winchester, written about the same time, and the difference between compositions in a living and dead language will be apparent. How fortunate was it that he did not write his Ode on the Nativity in Latin! the same ideas and sentiments might no doubt have been there, but how differently expressed! Beautiful as Milton's Latin poetry must be confessed to be, it probably does not find, even among those familiar with the language, one reader for fifty readers of his English poetry; and few, perhaps, ever read his Latin poems without a secret wish that he had written them in English."—Keightley's Life, &c. of Milton, 390.

Milton the Prose-Writer.

"In truth, it is very hard to write good English: and few have attained its height, in this last frie of books, but Mr. Milton."—Pref. to Charles Hotham's Introduction to the Teutonick Philosophie, Englished by D. F., Lon., 1648, 16mo.

"His prose writings breathe throughout that sublime, ethereal spirit peculiar only to him. We are continually astonished and delighted at his never-failing abundance of sentiments and imagery,—at that majestic stream and swell of thoughts with which his mind always flows. He was a man essentially great; and whoever wishes to form his language to a lofty and noble style, his character to a fervid sincerity of soul, will read the works of Milton."—Bishop Burnet.

"There is much reason for regretting that the prose works of Milton, where passages of such beauty occur, should be in the hands of so few readers, considering the advantages which might be derived to our literature from the study of their original and nervous eloquence."—Bishop Sumner.

"Milton is as great a writer in prose as in verse. . . . Prose conferred celebrity on him during his life, poetry after his death; but the renown of the prose-writer is lost in the glory of the poet. . . . I shall be proud to have lent a hand to draw Milton from his grave as a prose-writer; Glory long since said to him as a poet, 'Arise!' and he did arise; and never will he lie down again."—Viscount de Chateaubriand's Sketches of Eng. Lit., Pref., vii. 2, 31.

"The summit of fame is occupied by the poet, but the base of the vast elevation may justly be said to rest on his prose works; and we invite his admirers to descend from the former and survey the region that lies about the latter,—a less explored but not less magnificent domain."—Sir S. Egerton Brydges.

We have already referred (see Comus, ante) to the strong points of resemblance which Mr. Gifford imagines that he discovers between Milton and Ben Jonson:

"It is not, however," he proceeds, "in lighter and incidental matters only that Milton studied the great model afforded him by Jonson: we may find in him much that would almost tempt us to hold opinion with Pythagoras, and to believe that the very spirit and souls of some men become transfused into their poetical spirit and souls of some men become transfused into their poetical successors. The address of our earlier poet to two universities, prefixed to his most consummate performance,—the comedy of The Fox,—will strike every reader familiar with the happiest passages of Milton's prose with its wonderful resemblance. They were both of them emphatically poets who had sounded the depths and formed themselves in the school of classic lore."—Gifford's Jonson.

We need hardly pause to remark that Mr. Gifford can pay no higher compliment to an author than to allow him to have approached even remotely to the unequalled splendor of the "god of his idolatry,"—Rare Ben Jonson: he "brooks no brother near the throne."

"It is to be regretted that the prose writings of Milton should, in our time, be so little read. As compositions, they deserve the attention of every man who wishes to become acquainted with the full power of the English language. They abound with passages compared with which the finest declamations of Burke sink into insignificance. They are a perfect field of cloth of gold. The style is stiff with gorgeous embroidery. Not even in the earlier books of the Paradise Lost has the great poet ever risen higher than in those parts of his controversial works in which his feelings, excited by conflict, find a vent in bursts of devotional and lyric rapture. It is, to borrow his own majestic language, 'a sevenfold chorus of hallelujahs and harping symphonies.'

"We had intended to look more closely at these performances, to analyse the peculiarities of the diction, to dwell at some length on the sublime wisdom of the Areopagitica and the nervous rhetoric of the Iconoclast, and to point out some of those magnificent passages which occur in the Treatise of Reformation and the Animadversions on the Remonstrant. But the length to which our remarks have already extended renders this impossible."—Lord Macaulay: Crit. and Hist. Essays, 1854, i. 56–57.

"Southey. 'Before we open the volume of poetry, let me confess to you, I admire his prose less than you.'

"Landor. 'Probably because you dissent more widely from the opinions it conveys; for those who are displeased with any thing are unable to confine their displeasure to one spot. We dislike every thing a little when we dislike any thing much. It must indeed be admitted that his prose is often too Latinized and stiff. But I prefer his heavy-cut velvet, with its ill-placed Roman fibula, to the spangled gauze and gummed-on flowers and puffy flounces of our present street-walking literature. So do you, I am certain.'"

"How grandly the soul of Milton rolls and winds through the arches and labyrinths of his involved and magnificent diction, making musical echoes at every new turn and variation of its progress! but how could the thought of such a light trifler as Cibber travel through so glorious a maze without being lost or crushed in the journey!"—E. P. Whipple's Essays and Reviews, i. 110–111: Words.

"In John Milton's grand and holy fame there is no alloy. The man was as pure and great as the author. I am not sure whether (always excepting the minor poems) I do not prefer the stately and weighty march of his prose even to his lofty and resounding verse. I select some noble passages from his 'Appeal for the Liberty of Unlicensed Printing.'"—Miss M. R. Mitford's Recollec. of a Lit. Life, Chap. XLII.: Great Prose-Writers.

"What saith Milton on the height of this great argument [Religious Poetry]? Hear him in prose that wants nothing but numbers to equal it with any page in 'Paradise Lost.' 'These abilities are the inspired gifts of God,' &c. [From On Church Government, Book ii., quotation ending with the line "though they were rugged and difficult indeed."]"—Montgomery's Lects. on General Lit., Poetry, &c., Lect. V.

"The distinguishing quality of Milton's prose-writing is vigour, to which are to be added earnestness, dignity, and eloquence, joined with sound logical reasoning from his premises, which, however, are not always to be admitted. . . . It is not unworthy of notice that, while in English prose he delighted in long and involved sentences, his Latin periods are neither very long nor much involved. This probably arose from his close adherence to his models: for the genius of the Latin language, unlike the Greek, is inclined to brevity and condensation."—Keightley's Life, &c. of Milton, 385, 388.

"Milton, the most distinguished writer of the day, who, as Wordsworth has remarked, 'though a Hebrew in soul, was deeply imbued with classical literature,' constrained his rich and glorious imagination into the rigid inversions of the Latin idiom; and it was not until the Restoration that this preposterous accommodation of a living language to the genius of a dead one was entirely laid aside."—Wm. H. Prescott: N. Amer. Rev., xiv. 325: Essay-Writing.

"Through all his greator works there prevails an uniform peculiarity of diction, a mode and cast of expression which bears little resemblance to that of any former writer, and which is so far removed from common use that an unlearned reader, when he first opens his book, finds himself surprised by a new language.

"This novelty has been, by those who can find nothing wrong in Milton, imputed to his laborious endeavours after words suitable to the grandeur of his ideas. Our language, says Addison, sunk under him. But the truth is that both in prose and verse he had formed his style by a perverse and pedantic principle. He was desirous to use English words with a foreign idiom. This in all his prose is discovered and condemned, for there judgment operates freely, neither softened by the beauty nor awed by the dignity of his thoughts; but such is the power of his poetry that his call is obeyed without resistance, the reader feels himself in captivity to a higher and nobler mind, and criticism sinks in admiration."—Johnson's Life of Milton.

Mr. Peter Cunningham has a note on the above, which we subjoin:

"The admirers of Milton's political opinions, and some too who comprehend his poetry, have found his prose style

'Not harsh and crabbed, as dull fools suppose,
But musical as is Apollo's lute.'

This, however, is not the case. The structure of his sentences is generally cumbersome. When no longer confined to numbers, he is awkward and unwieldy as a swan out of water. What Donne is in poetic pauses Milton is in the euphony of prose. [See our life of John Donne, p. 512 of this Dictionary.] He is behind the best of his contemporaries,—behind Taylor, and not to be compared for a moment with either Hobbes or Cowley. In his reply to the Eikon, whatever advantage he may have in argument is not assisted by his style; for Gauden has at least the better of him in the easy gracefulness of a good style."—Johnson's Lives, &c., Cunningham's ed., 1854, i. 162, n.

"His prose writings are disagreeable, though not altogether deficient in genius."—Hume's Hist. of Eng., Bowyer's ed., 1806, iv 666.

"Milton's prose works are exceeding stiff and pedantic."—Dr. Richard Farmer: Letter on the Study of English History, in Goodhugh's E. G. Lib. Man., 43.

"Dr. Johnson endeavoured to give an air of dignity and novelty to his diction by affecting the order of words usual in poetry Milton's prose has not only this drawback, but it has also the disadvantage of being formed on a classic model. It is like a fine translation from the Latin; and, indeed, he wrote originally in Latin. . . . Milton's prose style savours too much of poetry, and, as I have already hinted, of an imitation of the Latin."—Hazlitt's Table-Talk, Essay XXIV.: On the Prose Style of Poets.

"The polemical writings of Milton—which chiefly fall within this period [1600 to '50]—contain several bursts of his splendid imagination and grandeur of soul. They are, however, much inferior to the Areopagitica, or Plea for the Liberty of Unlicensed Printing. Many passages in this famous tract are admirably eloquent: an intense love of liberty and truth glows through it; the majestic soul of Milton breathes such high thoughts as had not been uttered before; yet even here he frequently sinks in a single instant, as is usual with our old writers, from his highest flights to the ground. His intermixture of familiar with learned phraseology is unpleasing, his structure is affectedly elaborate, and he seldom reaches any harmony. If he turns to invective,—as sometimes in this treatise, and more in his Apology for Smectymnuus,—it is mere ribaldrous vulgarity blended with pedantry: his wit is always poor and without ease. An absence of idiomatic grace and an use of harsh inversions, violating the rules of the language, distinguish, in general, the writings of Milton, and require, in order to compensate them, such high beauties as will sometimes occur. . . . The verse of Milton is sometimes wanting in grace, and almost always in ease; but what better can be said of his prose? His foreign idioms are too frequent in the one; but they predominate in the other."—Hallam's Lit. Hist. of Europe, 4th ed., 1854, iii. 150–151, 480.

Let us notice a little more in detail a few of Milton's prose works, and, first, the one so highly commended by Mr. Hallam.

Areopagitica; or, Speech for the Liberty of Unlicensed Printing.

"The best English prose work that he ever wrote. . . . In this energetic language we recognise the author of 'Paradise Lost.' . . . The liberty of the press ought to deem it a high honour to have for its patron the author of 'Paradise Lost.' He was the first by whom it was fairly and formally claimed. With what pathetic art the poet calls to mind that he had beheld Galileo, bent with age and infirmities, ready to expire in the fetters of the censorship for having dared to assert the motion of the earth! This was an example congenial with the greatness of Milton. What would become of us now-a-days if we were to hold such language!"—Chateaubriand's Sketches of Eng. Lit., ii. 29, 31.

"This Mitford pronounces the finest production in prose from Milton's pen. For vigour and eloquence of style, unconquerable force of argument, majesty and richness of language, it is not to be surpassed."—C. D. Cleveland: Sketch of the Life of Milton, prefixed to his ed. of the Poetical Works of Milton, 1854, 11.

"The most close, conclusive, comprehensive, and decisive vindication of the liberty of the press that has yet appeared."—Warton.

"We must not expect from Milton a defence of the freedom of the press built on the same principles or argued with the same precision and perspicuity which we should look for in the treatise of a modern jurist. The merit of the former must be sought rather in the boldness and daring singularity of his opinions as a political writer than in their originality or truth; but this is no little merit. Right or wrong, it was no common intellect which adopted, in that fanatical and superstitious age, the doctrines of free divorce and unlimited liberty of printing. . . . In spite of the disjointed and incoherent manner, so ill adapted to exhibit the full weight of argument in its clearest and most striking point of view, but which is so common a defect in the oratorical productions of all ages as to appear almost inseparable from that mode of writing, we believe the chief reasons in favour of the freedom of the press are deducible from this."—Speech for the Liberty of Unlicensed Printing: Lon. Retrosp. Rev., 1824, ix. 1–19. Read the whole of this review.

"He attacked the licensing-system in that sublime treatise which every statesman should wear as a sign upon his hand and as frontlets between his eyes."—Lord Macaulay: Crit. and Histor. Essays, 1854, i. 55.

"The most splendid argument, perhaps, the world had then witnessed in behalf of intellectual liberty."—Prescott's Hist. of the Reign of Ferd. and Isab., 11th ed., 1856, iii. 191, n.

Pro Populo Anglicano Defensio contra Salmatii Defensionem Regiam. This Defence was published in accordance with the following order:

"1649–50, Jan. 8.—That Mr. Milton doe prepare something in answer to the book of Salmasius, and when he hath done itt bring itt to the Councill."—Order-Book of the Council of State: Todd's Life of Milton, ed. 1852, 72.

Toland says—and many after him—that Milton received £1000 for writing this Defence; but the council-minutes contain only a record of thanks: see Todd's Life of Milton, ed. 1852, 81.

To enter into any detailed examination of the respective merits and demerits of the controversy between Milton and Salmasius will hardly be expected in a work of this character, and will be the less requisite as we shall presently be called upon to present some opinions based in a large measure upon these exponents of political partisanship. (See 4. MILTON THE MAN AND THE POLITICIAN.)

"The best Apology that ever was offered for bringing kings to the block."—THOMAS WARTON, D.D.

"Hobbes declared himself unable to decide whose language was best or whose arguments were worst. In my opinion, Milton's periods are smoother, neater, and more pointed; but he delights himself with teasing his adversary as much as with confuting him. . . . No man forgets his original trade: the rights of nations and of kings sink into questions of grammar if grammarians discuss them. . . . Milton's book was much read; for paradox recommended by spirit and elegance easily gains attention; and he who told every man that he was equal to his king could hardly want an audience."—Johnson's Life of Milton.

"He who fought at barriers with Salmasius,
Engaged with nothing but his style and phrases;
Waived to assert the murder of a prince,
The author of false Latin to convince;
But laid the merits of the cause aside,
By those that understood them to be tried;
And counted breaking Priscian's head a thing
More capital than to behead a king,
For which he's been admired by all the learn'd,
Of knaves concern'd and pedants unconcern'd."

BUTLER: Upon Human Learning.

"NORTH. 'I would rather die upon a pile of blazing magazines, like Sardanapalus on his throne, than write one word within one million of miles of the personalities of Milton—the divine Milton—against Salmasius.'

"DR. SCOTT. 'Keep us a'! Is that the same great gospel-gun that wrote the Paradise Lost that the Spectautor speaks sae muckle about?'"—Noctes Ambros., May, 1822.

"'Those attacks upon a king who is no more,' justly and eloquently observes M. Villemain, 'those insults beyond the scaffold, had something abject and ferocious, which the enthusiastic mind of Milton was so dazzled by false zeal as not to perceive.' 'Defensio pro Populo Anglicano' is written in elegant and classic Latin prose; but Milton appears here merely as a translator of his own thoughts conceived in English, and he thus loses his national originality. All these masterpieces of modern Latinity would excite a smile in the scholars of Rome if they were to rise from their graves. . . . This quarrel about Latin is a common quarrel among scholars: every proficient in Greek and Latin asserts that his neighbour knows not a word of those languages."—Chateaubriand's Sketches of Eng. Lit., ii. 45, 46.

"Salmasius was very proud, self-confident, disdainful, and has consequently fallen into many errors and even contradictions through precipitancy. In his controversy with Milton—for which he was little fitted—he is rather feeble, and glad to escape from the severity of his antagonist by a defence of his own Latinity."—Hallam's Lit. Hist. of Europe, 4th ed., 1854, ii. 283.

"If any thing more were wanting to the justification of Milton, the book of Salmasius would furnish it. That miserable performance is now with justice considered only as a beacon to wordcatchers who wish to become statesmen. The celebrity of the man who refuted it—the 'Ænese magni dextra'—gives it all its fame with the present generation."—LORD MACAULAY: Crit. and Hist. Essays, 1854, i. 43.

Bishop Hacket gives a very different judgment. After commencing with his respects to the author of the Defensio, denominating him that "serpent Milton, that black-mouthed Zoilus that blows his viper's breath upon those immortal Devotions from the beginning to the end," he proceeds, "Oh, horrid! that defended the lawfulness of the greatest crime that ever was committed,—to put our thrice-excellent king to death: a petty schoolboy scribbler that durst grapple in such a cause with the prince of learned men of his age, Salmasius," &c.—Life of Archbishop Williams, 161.

Voltaire is not particularly complimentary to either antagonist: he observes that "Salmasius attacks like a pedant, and that Milton replies like a wild beast."

HISTORY OF ENGLAND:

"comprising the whole fable of Geoffrey of Monmouth, and continued to the Norman invasion. Why he should have given the first part—which he seems not to believe, and which is universally rejected—it is difficult to conjecture. The style is harsh; but it has something of rough vigour, which perhaps may often strike, though it cannot please. . . . To compile a history from various authors, when they can only be consulted by other eyes, is not easy nor possible but by more skilful and attentive help than can be commonly obtained, [see PRESCOTT, WILLIAM HICKLING;] and it was probably the difficulty of consulting and comparing that stopped Milton's narrative at the Conquest,—a period at which affairs were not very intricate nor authors very numerous. . . . On this history the licenser again fixed his claws, and, before he could transmit it to the press, tore out several parts. Some censures of the Saxon monks were taken away, lest they should be applied to the modern clergy, and a character of the Long Parliament and Assembly of Divines was excluded,—of which the author gave a copy to the Earl of Anglesea, and which, being afterwards published, has been since inserted in its proper place."—Johnson's Life of Milton.

"The history of that period abounds in names, but is extremely barren of events; or the events are related so much without circumstances and causes that the most profound or most eloquent writer must despair of rendering them either instructive or entertaining to the reader. Even the great learning and vigorous imagination of Milton sunk under the weight; and this author scruples not to declare that the skirmishes of kites or crows as much merited a particular narrative as the confused transactions and battles of the Saxon Heptarchy."—Hume's Hist. of England, Bowyer's ed., 1806, i. 28.

"The Heptarchy, whatever Hume may say, is very clearly depicted. The style of this work is manly, simple; and it is interspersed with reflections nearly always relating to the time in which the historian wrote. . . . It would be impossible to preserve the charm of the original in a translation. The narrator renders his style as antique as those of the chronicles whence he draws the recital. I had need to reproduce the story of King Lear in the language of Froissart. Milton delighted to wrestle with Shakspeare as Jacob with the angel."—Chateaubriand's Sketches of Eng. Lit., ii. 83, 89.

"It is written with great simplicity, contrary to his custom in his prose writings, and is the better for it. But he sometimes rises into a surprising grandeur in the sentiments and expressions,—as at the end of the second book. I never saw any thing equal to this but the conclusion of Sir Walter Raleigh's History of the World."—BISHOP WARBURTON: Mitford's Life of Milton, lxxxi.

"From this decision we dissent. We cannot discern the lauded simplicity: on the contrary, the inversions and Latinisms with which it abounds are far more offensive in mere narrative than when, as in his controversial writings, they are mingled with vigorous learning, lofty declamation, or keen invective."—Keightley's Life, &c. of Milton, 377–378.

"We shall not mention in future either the memoirs by persons concerned in public events or particular accounts of detached periods, making one exception for Milton's History of England to the Norman Conquest, for the sake of the greatness of the name and in some measure for the value of the work."—DR. JOHN ALLEN: Edin. Rev., liii. 10.

"Some apology may be thought necessary for making a work so accessible as the present the subject of criticism. The truth is, however, that it is a work which very few read, and which has for the greater part no attractions for the general reader: there are, nevertheless, a few passages of story and sentiment which are calculated to be universally interesting; and it is with the purpose of separating these from the other matter and presenting them to the reader in a collected form that we have adopted it as the subject of an article. . . . Our author's patience, as may be supposed, fails him during the dry and endless recital of the obscure wars and petty negotiations of the Heptarchy."—Lon. Retrosp. Rev., 1822, vi. 87–100.

What this critic has undertaken to do for the History of England an ardent admirer of Milton has recently effected for his prose works generally: we have the results of this eclectic process in an octavo volume entitled The Poetry of Milton's Prose, selected from his various Writings, with Notes and an Introductory Essay. Two 12mo vols., styled Milton's Select Prose Works, were pub. in 1840. The historical student must not fail to procure the ed. of Milton's History of England, 1818, imp. 8vo, edited by Baron Maseres.

LETTER TO MASTER HARTLIB ON EDUCATION.

"This abounds with bursts of his elevated spirit, and sketches out a model of public colleges wherein the teaching should be more comprehensive, more liberal, more accommodated to what he deems the great aim of education than what was in use. 'That,' he says, 'I call a complete and generous education which fits a man to perform justly, skilfully, and magnanimously all the offices, both private and public, of peace and war.' But when Milton descends to specify the course of studies he would recommend, it appears singularly ill chosen and impracticable, nearly confined to ancient writers, even in mathematics and other subjects where they could not be sufficient, and likely to leave the student very far from that aptitude for offices of war and peace which he had held forth as the reward of his diligence."—Hallam's Lit. Hist. of Europe, 4th ed., 1854, iii. 420.

"Milton's plan has more of show than value."—WARTON.

"We have always regarded this treatise of Milton's as a singular instance of how even the greatest of minds will allow themselves to be beguiled by their imagination. . . . Surely his experience in teaching might have shown him that what he proposed was little short of impossibility in the present condition of human nature,—a condition not likely ever to be essentially altered. A limit is set to our acquisitions, and he who seeks to be acquainted with too many things will find himself in the end having little real knowledge of any. Most fortunate, too, for the world, we may add, was it that Milton himself was, as he informs us, educated on a different system, and his splendid imagination allowed to attain its full development. . . . We cannot conclude without expressing our approval of the regard shown to religion in this system of education."—Keightley's Life, &c. of Milton, 239–240, 241.

"We had a quiet, comfortable meeting at Mr. Dilly's: nobody there but ourselves. Mr. Dilly mentioned somebody having wished that Milton's 'Tractate on Education' should be printed along with his Poems in the edition of the English Poets then going on. JOHNSON: 'It would be breaking in upon the plan, but would be of no great consequence. So far as it would be any thing, it would be wrong. Education in England has been in danger of being hurt by two of its greatest men,—Milton and Locke. Milton's plan is impracticable, and, I suppose, has never been tried.'"—Boswell's Life of Johnson, ed. 1848, r. 8vo, 618.

See our life of JOHN LOCKE, p. 1114 of this Dictionary.

The following noble sentence from Milton's Tractate on Education should be the first article in every programme of educational exercises, public or private:

"The end of learning is to repair the ruins of our first parents by regaining to know God aright." This dictum is worthy of the Paradise Lost and Paradise Regained.

Before we leave this division of our subject, we may be permitted to record the expression of our regret that this most illustrious of schoolmasters never carried out his design (for which he had copious collections) of the compilation of a Latin Dictionary. For educational purposes, indeed, it would have been of little use: the researches of the philologists of our own day—of Gesner, Fracciolati, Scheller, Georges, Freund, Kaltschmidt, Rich, Smith, Riddle, Schmitz, Zumpt, Anthon, Andrews, Leverett, Robbins, Turner, Felton, Woolsey, and many others in Germany, England, and America—have filled our school-libraries with more classical erudition than the pupils of this or the next generation will be competent to master. But who would not have been pleased to see in a state of rest and arranged in appropriate columns that formidable army of well-disciplined troops with which the veteran leader of the English Republic attacked with such vigour and—his champions say—with such success the redoubtable charge of the hitherto unconquerable Salmasius? Again: it is almost superfluous to remark that Milton's Latin Dictionary would have been an invaluable key to the sources of many of the felicitous classical appropriations and adaptations which abound in his works. But we linger too long over vain imaginations of what might have been done, whilst our narrative remains incomplete of what was actually effected.

De Doctrina Christiana, Libri duo Posthumi.

The history of this work is well known: it was found by Mr. Lemon, Deputy-Keeper of the State Papers, in a press of his office, in 1823: see No. 64, (ante.) There was some disposition, on the first publication of the work, (in 1825,) to question its pretensions to its professed authorship; but there never was any intelligent doubt on the subject.

"The authenticity of this work appears indisputable: were the history of the manuscript less satisfactory, the internal evidence would be conclusive. The mind of Milton is stamped on every page. Not only are the known opinions of this remarkable man maintained with the usual seriousness of his character, but the manner in which he arrived at certain newer tenets, adopted at a later period of life, bears the same unquestionable impress of his peculiar way of thinking. . . . We cannot anticipate the extensive or lasting popularity of this treatise. The prose works of Milton are little read, notwithstanding their occasional sublimity both of thought and diction. In the present work, when the curiosity which its discovery has excited shall subside, there is little to attract, little to keep alive a greater degree of interest than in any other divinity of that age. . . . In the plenitude and abundance of his fame as the author of Paradise Lost, Milton must be content to merge his claims upon public attention as the writer of a summary of theology."—Lon. Quar. Rev., xxxii. 442–457.

"The character of Milton, long as it has been before the world, has, until lately, been but partially understood. It is not to be gathered from his poetry alone; and his prose (vigorous as some of it is) has been but little studied; nor, indeed, are his views on many points so fully developed in any of his former works as in this most curious Treatise of Christian Doctrine. In him we now possess, filled up with all the accuracy of detail, a magnificent specimen of the Puritan in his least offensive form: the fervour, the devotion, the honest indignation, the moral fearlessness, the uncompromising impetuosity, the fantastic imagination, of the party, all conspicuous,—unalloyed, however, by the hypocrisy, the vulgarity, the cant, the cunning and bad taste which have so generally made the name to stink in the nostrils of men. . . . We have thus entered into the personal character of Milton somewhat more at large, because its leading feature has not been hitherto sufficiently marked. All the world knew that he was an eloquent, a high-minded, 'an austere man,' mighty in the Scriptures; but how visionary he was (though Warburton threw out hints that could not have been altogether neglected by able inquirers) none of his biographers have ever told us: not indeed, perhaps, until the Treatise on Christian Doctrine was brought to light could they tell us at full: yet here, and here alone, will be found the solution of many anomalies in his history and of many peculiarities in his poems."—Robert Southey: Lon. Quar. Rev., xxxvi. 42.

"The book itself will not add much to the fame of Milton. It is, like all his Latin works, well written, though not exactly in the style of the prize-essays of Oxford and Cambridge. There is no elaborate imitation of classical antiquity, no scrupulous purity, none of the ceremonial cleanness which characterizes the diction of our academical Pharisees. The author does not attempt to polish and brighten his composition into the Ciceronian gloss and brilliancy. He does not, in short, sacrifice sense and spirit to pedantic refinements. The nature of his subject compelled him to use many words

'That would have made Quintilian stare and gasp.'

"But he writes with as much ease and freedom as if Latin were his mother-tongue; and where he is least happy his failure seems to arise from the carelessness of a native, not from the ignorance of a foreigner. We may apply to him what Denham with great felicity says of Cowley:—he wears the garb, but not the clothes, of the ancients.

"Throughout the volumes are discernible the traces of a powerful and independent mind emancipated from the influence of authority and devoted to the search of truth. Milton professes to form his system from the Bible alone; and his digest of Scripture texts is certainly among the best that have appeared. But he is not always so happy in his inferences as in his citations.

"Some of the heterodox doctrines which he avows seem to have excited considerable amazement,—particularly his Arianism and his theory on the subject of polygamy. Yet we can scarcely conceive that any person could have read the Paradise Lost without suspecting him of the former; nor do we think that any reader acquainted with the history of his life ought to be much startled at the latter. The opinions which he has expressed respecting the nature of the Deity, the eternity of matter, and the observation of the Sabbath, might, we think, have caused more just surprise.

"But we will not go into the discussion of these points. The book, were it far more orthodox or far more heretical than it is, would not much edify or corrupt the present generation. The men of our time are not to be converted or perverted by quartos. A few more days, and this essay will follow the Defensio Populi to the dust and silence of the upper shelf. The name of its author and the remarkable circumstances attending its publication will secure to it a certain degree of attention. For a month or two it will occupy a few minutes of chat in every drawing-room and a few columns in every magazine; and it will then—to borrow the elegant language of the playbills—be withdrawn to make room for the forthcoming novelties."—Lord Macaulay: Crit. and Hist. Essays, 1854, i. 2–3.

"It is said that the discovery of Milton's Arianism, in this rigid generation, has already impaired the sale of Paradise Lost."—Hallam's Lit. Hist. of Europe, 4th ed., 1854. iii. 474. See also 278.

3. Milton's General Characteristics as an Author.

Few men have ever so thoroughly prepared themselves for comprehensive and successful authorship as did the illustrious subject of our notice:

"Milton.—the most perfect scholar, as well as the sublimest poet, that our country has ever produced."—Sir William Jones: Letter to Lady Spencer, Sept. 7th, 1769, describing his visit to Milton's house at Forest Hill.

"He received a learned education: he was a profound and elegant classical scholar: he had studied all the mysteries of Rabbinical literature: he was intimately acquainted with every language of modern Europe from which either pleasure or information was then to be derived."—Lord Macaulay: Crit. and Histor. Essays, 1854, i. 9.

His lordship, indeed, endeavours to prove that the development of the poetic talent is in an inverse ratio to mental culture and thorough scholarship, and therefore that, in becoming a great poet in spite of his extensive erudition, Milton was obliged to overcome difficulties as great as his learning was comprehensive and profound. We shall not pause to ask whether this be intended as a serious proposition or as an ingenious paradox. Extract the scholarship from Paradise Lost, Comus, Lycidas, or Samson Agonistes, and much of the lofty superstructure will surely "topple to its fall." We continue our quotations from this eminent critic:

"The most striking characteristic of the poetry of Milton is the extreme remoteness of the associations by means of which it acts on the reader. Its effect is produced not so much by what it expresses as by what it suggests,—not so much by the ideas which it directly conveys as by other ideas which are connected with them. He electrifies the mind through conductors. The most unimaginative man must understand the Iliad. Homer gives him no choice and requires from him no exertion, but takes the whole upon himself, and sets the images in so clear a light that it is impossible to be blind to them. The works of Milton cannot be comprehended or enjoyed unless the mind of the reader co-operate with that of the writer. He does not paint a finished picture or play for a mere passive listener. He sketches, and leaves others to fill up the outline. He strikes the key-note, and expects his hearer to make out the melody. . . . It would, indeed, be scarcely safe to draw any decided inferences as to the character of a writer from passages directly egotistical. But the qualities which we have ascribed to Milton, though perhaps most strongly marked in those parts of his works which treat of his personal feelings, are distinguishable in every page, and impart to all his writings, prose and poetry, English, Latin, and Italian, a strong family-likeness."—Ibid., ii. 29.

"That Milton was as great a scholar as a poet we see by his writing in Latin as fluently as in English: he composed Greek verses; witness some of his minor pieces. It was from the original text of the Prophets that he derived their fire. The lyre of Tasso was not unknown to him. He spoke nearly all the living languages of Europe. Antonio Francini, a Florentine, expresses himself with regard to Milton as if the poet of Albion, while journeying through Italy, had been in the full enjoyment of his fame:—'Another Babel would for him confuse tongues in vain; for, England! besides thy most noble idiom, he is master of Spanish, French, Tuscan, Greek, and Latin.'"—Chateaubriand's Sketches of Eng. Lit., ii. 82.

"Milton was perhaps the first writer [in England] who eminently possessed a genuine discernment and feeling of antiquity: though it may be perceived in Spenser and also a very few who wrote prose."—Hallam's Lit. Hist. of Europe, 4th ed., 1854, iii. 32.

"Of all the borrowers from Homer, Milton is perhaps the least indebted. He was naturally a thinker for himself, confident of his own abilities, and disdainful of help or hindrance: he did not refuse admission to the thoughts or images of his predecessors, but he did not seek them. From his contemporaries he neither courted nor received support; there is in his writings nothing by which the pride of other authors might be gratified, or favour gained,—no exchange of praise, nor solicitation of support. His great works were performed under discountenance and in blindness; but difficulties vanished at his touch: he was born for whatever is arduous; and his work is not the greatest of heroic poems only because it is not the first."—Johnson's Life of Milton.

"It is certain that this author, when in a happy mood and employed on a noble subject, is the most wonderfully sublime of any poet in any language, Homer and Lucretius and Tasso not excepted. More concise than Homer, more simple than Tasso, more nervous than Lucretius, had he lived in a later age and learned to polish some rudeness in his verses, had he enjoyed better fortune and possessed leisure to watch the returns of genius on himself, he had attained the pinnacle of perfection and borne away the palm of epic poetry."—Hume's History of England, Bowyer's ed., 1806, iv. 666.

"Call him henceforward the most glorious one that ever existed upon earth. If two—Bacon and Shakspeare—have equalled him in diversity and intensity of power, did either of these spring away with such resolution from the sublimest heights of genius to liberate and illuminate with patient labour the manacled human race? And what is his recompense? The same recompense as all men like him have received, and will receive for ages. Persecution follows righteousness: the Scorpion is next in succession to Libra. The fool, however, who ventures to detract from Milton's genius in the night which now appears to close on him, will, when the dawn has opened on his dull ferocity, be ready to bite off a limb if he might thereby limp away from the trap he has prowled into. Among the gentler, the better, and the wiser, few have entered yet the awful structure of his mind; few comprehend, few are willing to contemplate, its vastness. Politics now occupy scarcely a closet in it. We seldom are inclined to converse on them; and, when we do, it is jocosely rather than austerely. For ever the bitterest berries grow less acrid when they have been hanging long on the tree. . . . A great poet represents a great portion of the human race. Nature delegated to Shakspeare the interests and direction of the whole: to Milton a smaller part, but with plenary power over it; and she bestowed on him such fervour and majesty of eloquence as on no other mortal in any age. . . . If ever there was a poet who knew Nature well and described her in all her loveliness, it was Milton. . . . Milton has equal strength [with Demosthenes] without an abatement of beauty,—not a sinew sharp or rigid, not a vein varicose or inflated. Hercules killed robbers and ravishers with his knotted club; he cleansed also royal stables by turning whole rivers into them: Apollo, with no labour or effort, overcame the Python, brought around him, in the full accordance of harmony, all the Muses, and illuminated with his sole splendour the universal world. Such is the difference I see between Demosthenes and Milton. . . . I find traces in Milton of nearly all the best Latin poets. This is singular; for there is in both of them a generous warmth and a contemptuous severity. . . . Warton and Johnson are of opinion that Milton is defective in the sense of harmony. But Warton had lost his ear by laying it down on low and swampy places, on ballads and sonnets; and Johnson was a deaf adder coiled up in the brambles of party prejudices. He was acute and judicious, he was honest and generous, he was forbearing and humane; but he was cold when he was overshadowed."—W. S. Landor.

"That fervid genius, which has cast a sort of shade upon all the other works of man."—Lord Erskine.

"It will not be too much to say that, of all uninspired writings, (if these be uninspired,) Milton's are the most worthy of profound study by all minds which would know the creativeness, the splendour, the learning, the eloquence, the wisdom, which the human intellect can reach. Among the miraculous acquirements of Milton was his deep and familiar intimacy with all classical and all chivalrous literature,—the amalgamation in his mind of all the philosophy and all the sublime and ornamented literature of the ancients, and all the abstruse, the laborious, the immature learning of those who again drew off the mantle of Time from the ancient treasures of genius and mingled with them their own crude conceptions and fantastic theories. He extracted from this mine all that would aid the imagination without shocking the reason. He never rejected philosophy, but, where it was fabulous, only offered it as ornament. . . . He had not only one requisite of the Muse, but every one, of the highest order and in the highest degree. His invention of poetical fable and poetical imagery was exhaustless, and always grand, and always consistent with the faith of a cultivated and sensitive mind. Sublimity was his primary and unfailing power. His characters were new, surprising, gigantic, or beautiful, and full of instruction such as high wisdom sanctioned. His sentiments were lofty, comprehensive, eloquent, consistent, holy, original, and an amalgamation of spirit, religion, intellect, and marvellous learning. His language was his own,—sometimes a little rough and unvernacular, but as magnificent as his mind,—of pregnant thought, naked in its strength, rich and picturesque where imagery was required, often exquisitely harmonious where the occasion permitted, but sometimes strong, mighty, and speaking with the voice of thunder. . . . With him we rise to the stern simplicity of inspired wisdom: he leaves us in no state of factitious heat, to fall again, like Icarus, after having mounted on false wings: we find breathed into us a calm fortitude; we expect sorrows, and wrongs, and dangers, and are prepared for them; we covet no inebriate visions, and thus expose ourselves to no blight on a diseased susceptibility. The elevation is sublime, yet, by its sublimity, gives us mastery to grapple with earth."—Sir S. Egerton Brydges.

"I found in him [Milton] a true sublimity, lofty thoughts which were cloathed with admirable Grecisms, and ancient words which he had been digging from the mine of Chaucer and Spenser, and which, with all their rusticity, had something of venerable in them."—Dryden: Discourse on the Origin and Progress of Satire, prefixed to his Juvenal.

"The mind of him who likened himself in his darkness to

'Blind Thamyris, and blind Menoides,
And Tiresias, and Pheneus, prophets old'

was a treasury overflowing with the gems and gold of the past,—riches garnered from the east and west, and from either pole; from the lands and languages of the Hebrew, the Assyrian, the Greek, the Roman, and the Italian; from the regions sparkling with barbaric pearl and gold, to where

'Chineses drive their cany wagons light;'

from Tartarian wilds, where the fabled Arimaspian keeps watch over buried treasures, to Norwegian halls, where bourgeon the giant pines,

'Fit for the mast of some great Ammiral.'"

Moir's Sketches of the Poet. Lit. of the Past Half-Century, 71.

"The very splendour of his poetic fame has tended to obscure or conceal the extent of his mind and the variety of its energies and attainments. To many he seems only a poet, when in truth he was a profound scholar, a man of vast compass of thought, imbued thoroughly with all ancient and modern learning, and able to master, to mould, to impregnate with his own intellectual power, his great and various acquisitions. . . . In delineating Milton's character as a poet, we are saved the necessity of looking far for its distinguishing attributes. His name is almost identified with sublimity. He is in truth the sublimest of men. He rises, not by effort or discipline, but by a native tendency and a godlike instinct, to the contemplation of objects of grandeur and awfulness. He always moves with a conscious energy. There is no subject so vast or terrific as to repel or intimidate him. The overpowering grandeur of a theme kindles and attracts him. . . . This attribute of power is universally felt to characterize Milton. His sublimity is in every man's mouth. Is it felt that his poetry breathes a sensibility and tenderness hardly surpassed by its sublimity? . . . We might quote pages in illustration of the qualities here ascribed to Milton. . . . In illustration of Milton's tenderness, we will open almost at a venture. . . . We close our remarks on Milton's poetry with observing that it is characterized by seriousness. . . But Milton's poetry, though habitually serious, is always healthful, and bright, and vigorous. It has no gloom. He took no pleasure in drawing dark pictures of life; for he knew, by experience, that there is a power in the soul to transmute calamity into an occasion and nutriment of moral power and triumphant virtue."—William E. Channing, D.D.: Essay on the Poetical Genius of Milton.

"Milton possessed an imagination of the highest order,—an imagination which could combine or create at will the noblest objects of contemplation. His early poems sufficiently attest the energy of this divine power in his mind. The classical style of his verses never affects its originality, and they run like a stream of life and beauty wherever the imagination is free to operate. All the other faculties of his intellect received their tone from this . . . His deficiency of passion was the only element which was wanting to the perfection of his poetic character. When we examine it in respect to every other, we find it full and complete,—perfect not only in the higher and rarer requisites of genius, but in those lighter qualities from which inferior minds derive their sole claim to consideration."—Rev. Henry Stebbing: Memoirs of Milton.

"It is owing in part to his blindness, but more perhaps to his general residence in a city, that Milton, in the words of Coleridge, is 'not a picturesque but a musical poet,' or, as I would prefer to say, is the latter more of the two. He describes visible things, and often with great powers of rendering them manifest, what the Greeks called ἐνάργεια, though seldom with so much circumstantial exactness of character as Spenser or Dante, but he feels music. The sense of vision delighted his imagination; but that of sound wrapped his whole soul in ecstasy."—Hallam's Lit. Hist. of Europe, 4th ed., 1854, iii. 479.

"It has been, indeed, objected to Milton, by a common perversion of criticism, that his ideas were musical rather than picturesque, as if because they were in the highest degree musical they must be (to keep the sage critical balance even, and to allow no one man to possess two qualities at the same time) proportionably deficient in other respects. But Milton's poetry is not cast in any such narrow, commonplace mould; it is not so barren of resources. His worship of the muse was not so simple or confined. A sound arises we hear the pealing organ; but the incense on the altar is also there, and the statues of the gods are ranged around. The ear, indeed, predominates over the eye, because it is more immediately affected, and because the language of music blends more immediately with and forms a more natural accompaniment to the variable and indefinite associations of ideas conveyed by words. But where the associations of the imagination are the principal thing the individual object is given by Milton with equal force and beauty. . . . Milton's works are a perpetual invocation to the muses, —a hymn to fame. . . . Milton has borrowed more than any other writer, and exhausted every source of imitation, sacred and profane; yet he is perfectly distinct from every other writer. He is a writer of centos, and yet in originality scarce inferior to Homer. The power of his mind is stamped on every line. The fervour of his imagination melts down and renders malleable, as in a furnace, the most contradictory materials. In reading his works we feel ourselves under the influence of a mighty intellect, that the nearer it approaches to others becomes more distinct from them. The quantity of art in him shows the strength of his genius; the weight of his intellectual obligations would have oppressed any other writer. Milton's learning has all the effect of intuition. He describes objects, of which he could only have read in books, with all the vividness of actual observation. His imagination has the force of nature. He makes words tell as pictures."—Hazlitt's Lects. on the English Poets, Lect. III.: On Shakspeare and Milton.

'Like a steam of rich distill'd perfumes;'

"The name of Milton is a synonym for vastness of attainment, sublimity of conception, and splendour of expression. His poetry is a fountain of living waters in the very heart of civilization. It tendency is even more magnificent than its composition. Combining all that is lovely in religion with all that in reason is grand and beautiful, it creates whiles it gratifies, and, at the same time, purifies those tastes and powers that refine and exalt humanity. It is almost of itself, not less by the invigorating nature of its moral than of its intellectual qualities, sufficient to perpetuate the stability of an empire. To use his own words, his poetical writings 'are of power to inbreed and cherish in a great people the seeds of virtue and public civility.' They will be lost only with our language: the tide of his song will cease to flow only with that of time."—ROBERT FLETCHER: Introductory Review to Milton's Prose Works.

"Milton throws his own moral sublimity over the mean realities of life."—SIR JAMES MACKINTOSH: Life, vol. i. chap. v.

"We profess that superstitious veneration for the memory of the greatest of poets which would regard the slightest relic of him as sacred: and we cannot conceive either true poetical sensibility or a just sense of the glory of England to belong to that Englishman who would not feel the strongest emotions at the sight of a descendant of Milton, discovered in the person even of the most humble and unlettered of human beings."—SIR JAMES MACKINTOSH: Miscell. Works, 1854, ii. 199.

"Of Milton's mind the leading characteristic is its unity. He has the thoughts of all ages at his command; but he has made them his own. He sits 'high on a throne of royal state, adorned with all the wealth of Ormus and of Ind, and where the gorgeous East with richest hand has showered barbaric pearl and gold.' There are no false gems in him, no tinsel. It seems as if nothing could dwell in his mind but what was grand and sterling."—Guesses at Truth; by the brothers Hare.

"As a general quality of Milton's writings in verse, as in prose, we may observe the logical order and sequence in which his thoughts and arguments are arranged."—Keightley's Life, &c. of Milton.

"Sacred poetry is a walk which Milton alone has hitherto successfully trodden."—BISHOP HEBER: Lon. Quar. Rev., xxiii. 225.

"Milton's immortal verse never flowed between the autumnal and vernal equinox, but, mute in winter, his song was awakened by the temperature that made the groves, too, vocal."—LORD BROUGHAM: Contrib. to Edin. Rev., 1856, i. 251.

"The mind of Milton was perfect fairy-land; and every thought which entered it—whether grave or gay, magnificent or mean—quickly partook of a fairy form. . . . Nothing was ever so unearthly as his poetry. The most unpromising subject, after passing through his heated mind, comes out purged and purified and refined; the terrestrial body dissolves itself in the process, and we behold in its stead a glorified body. That which was by nature a frail and perishable flower, when transported by his fancy, becomes immortal amaranth. . . . The renewed interest for the writings of Milton which has recently manifested itself is a proof that the taste of the public is still undepraved; and in the more diligent contemplation of those writings the seeds of future poetical excellence may at this moment be scattered abroad. . . Of his poetry it would require a tongue like his own to speak the praise: it invigorates the understanding, it purifies the affections, it lifts up the heart to God, 'virtue goeth out of it.' Ever will it endure, to put to shame those who pervert the noblest gift of Heaven to low and sensual abuse. Ever will it remain a triumphant memorial that the lamp of genius shines with the brightest lustre when it is fed with the purest oil."—ROBERT SOUTHEY: Lon. Quar. Rev., xxxvi. 46, 46, 61.

"Nor second he that rode sublime
Upon the seraph-wings of Ecstasy,
The secrets of th' abyss to spy.
He pass'd the flaming bounds of place and time:
The living throne, the sapphire blaze,
Where angels tremble while they gaze,
He saw, but, blasted with excess of light,
Closed his eyes in endless night."

GRAY.

"Is not each great, each amiable Muse
Of classic ages in thy Milton met?
A genius universal as his theme;
Astonishing as Chaos; as the bloom
Of blooming Eden fair; as Heaven sublime."

THOMSON.

"He was not like those stars which only shine
When to pale mariners they storms portend:
He had his calmer influence, and his mien
Did love and majesty together blend."

DRYDEN.

"Thy soul was like a star, and dwelt apart:
Thou hadst a voice whose sound was like the sea —
Pure as the naked heavens, majestic, free:
So didst thou travel on life's common way
In cheerful godliness: and yet thy heart
The lowliest duties on herself did lay."

WORDSWORTH.

4. MILTON THE MAN AND THE POLITICIAN.

We have often had occasion to remark—and, we trust, have not failed to confirm precept by practice—that a writer of biographies, representing all classes of thought and shades of opinion, should be a cosmopolitan in the most liberal sense of that truly liberal term. Not unmindful of the responsibility which enforces a conscientious selection of, and a firm adherence to, his moral, political, and religious tenets, he should ever remember that a perpetual truce is proclaimed in that common depository of the thoughts of the illustrious dead out of those who still live to labour for their race,—the Soul of the House, as Cicero beautifully styles the Library. Thus believing and thus acting, we scruple not continually to record on our pages opinions the most directly opposed to each other, and, of course, as frequently directly opposed to our own. The ingenious student, eager for the acquisition of knowledge, and just beginning to "lift up his voice after wisdom and seeking after her as for hid treasure," will often be confounded to find the same eminent character chronicled on our pages—perchance on the same page—as a traitor and a patriot, a sage and a charlatan, an infidel and a saint. Party champions may blame us for such unusual candour; but we confess "we are not careful to answer in this matter:" the advocate of no class, our only anxiety shall be to do justice to all. This judicial impartiality—"wherein (let no man hear us) we take pride"—we certainly did not learn from the sanguinary bard who glorifies in the Musæ Anglicanæ the Oxford Decree of 1683, which anathematizes and condemns to the flames all the books then published in defence of the rights of mankind, and, among others, the works of John Milton. The exulting poet to whom we have referred, not sufficiently grateful for this philanthropic boon, permits his imagination to revel in the prospective spectacle of the unhappy writers keeping company with their favourite productions, and especially dwells upon the pleasing sight of

"In medio videas flamma crepitante cremari
MILTONUM—terris cœloque inamabile nomen!"

Such was the meed of encouragement which the author of the Defensio received from some of the scholars of his generation. This amiable person, however, is pleased afterwards to assure us that the fame of Milton would have perished only with the world if he had had discernment enough to sing the praises of Carolus Secundus. That Milton would have preferred to gratify the poet with the cremation which the latter had rehearsed with such gusto, who can doubt?

Hume was of too benevolent a constitution to burn anybody, although indeed a martyrdom by sarcasm (σαρκάζω) would be but little preferable. He thus notices the patriotic labours of the Defensio:

"It is, however, remarkable that the greatest genius by far that shone out in England during this period was deeply engaged with these fanatics, [the Parliamentary party,] and even prostituted his pen in theological controversy, in factious disputes, and in justifying the most violent measures of the party. This was John Milton, whose poems are admirable, though liable to some objections; his prose writings disagreeable, [doubtless to the historian,] though not altogether defective in genius."—Hume's Hist. of England, Bowyer's ed., 1806, iv. 666.

Even the gentle Addison, in one of the earliest fruits of his muse, rebukes the popular champion in no measured terms:

"Oh, had the poet ne'er profaned his pen
To varnish o'er the guilt of faithless men,
His other works might have deserved applause;
But now the language can't support the cause;
While the clear current, though serene and bright,
Betrays a bottom odious to the sight."—An Account of the Greatest English Poets to Henry Sacheverell, April 3, 1694: Addison's Works, H. G. Bohn's ed., 1854, i. 25.

Even Milton's attached friend, Andrew Marvell, did not defend all of his controversial writings:

"John Milton," he says to Bishop Parker, "was and is a man of as great learning and sharpness of wit as any man. It was his misfortune, living in a tumultuous time, to be tossed on the wrong side; and he wrote, flagrante bello, certain dangerous treatises," &c.

It is to be admitted that when the enthusiastic champion of liberty, clad with zeal as a cloak, went forth to meet his enemies, he did not linger to select the smoothest stones of the brook:

"The most violent philippics," remarks Professor Smyth, "that ever appeared against this party [the Presbyterian] may be found in the prose works of Milton. The invectives of this great poet against prelates and Presbyterians will perfectly astonish those who as yet are conversant only with his immortal work, his descriptions of the Garden of Eden and the piety and innocence of our first parents."—Lects. on Mod. Hist., Lect. XVI.

A late poet-laureate, who at one period of his life would have recorded a far different judgment, about the date of his fifty-third birthday thus discourses of Milton:

"The politics of Milton had been consigned to oblivion by common consent, until recent circumstances [the publication of the treatise De Doctrinâ Christianâ, in 1825] accidentally revived them; and now to oblivion they had better return: they are his 'uncomely parts.' . . . The most judicious of his admirers will admit that in his political writings the author of Paradise Lost has fallen; and their aim will be, not to expose that fall by making it a subject of eulogy, but to contribute towards its decency and to hide it with their mantle. . . . Nor do we speak thus of Milton unadvisedly: it is his own acknowledgment that in writing on matters of polity 'he knew himself inferior to himself,' and that, 'led by the genial power of nature to another task, he had in this but the use of his left hand.' . . . Whilst we bow, therefore, to Milton as the poet, in Milton as a divine or a statesman we can only see a visionary, and cannot but think that to assert his merits in these latter departments is to come forward (if we may use the words of a great master of eloquence) 'with hymns and cymbals to adore the mighty luminary when he is suffering an eclipse.'"—ROBERT SOUTHEY: Lon. Quar. Rev., xxxvi. 29, 40, 61.

We have already quoted different opinions on a preceding page, and can readily add to the list:

"Milton is our patriot. No man of just discernment can read his political writings without being penetrated with the holy flame that animated him. . . . As an original genius, as a writer of lofty and expansive soul, and as a man, he rises above his countrymen; and, like Saul in the convention of the Jews, from his shoulders and upward he is higher than any of the people."—GODWIN.

"It may be doubted whether the Creator ever created one altogether so great as Milton,—taking into one view at once (as much indeed as can at once be taken into it) his manly virtues, his superhuman genius, his zeal for truth, for true piety, freedom, his eloquence in displaying it, his contempt of personal power, his glory and exultation in his country's. . . . Were it possible that one among the faithful of the angels could have suffered wounds and dissolution in his conflict with the false, I should scarcely feel greater awe at discovering on some bleak mountain the bones of this our mighty defender, once shining in celestial panoply, once glowing at the trumpet-blast of God, but not proof against the desperate and the damned, than I have felt at entering the humble abode of Milton, whose spirit already reaches heaven, yet whose corporeal frame hath no quiet or safe resting-place here below."—W. S. LANDOR.

The reader probably remembers the graphic account which Sir William Jones gives to Lady Spencer of his visit (September 7, 1769) to Milton's house at Forest Hill: a paragraph in one of Madame du Bocage's Letters concerning England, informs us that on a visit, in June, 1750, to Baron Schutz and lady at their house near Shotover Hill,

"They shewed me from a small eminence Milton's house, [the same just referred to,] to which I bowed with all the reverence which that poet's memory inspires me."

See also Miss Mitford's Recollections of a Literary Life (1852, i. 45) for an interesting description of Milton's cottage at Chalfont St. Giles, four miles from Beaconsfield, Buckinghamshire. This is the retreat, it will be remembered, procured for the poet by Ellwood during the Great Plague of London. Mr. Howitt's history of Milton's residences will of course be eagerly perused. No one could doubt that this gentleman would write enthusiastically of the great champion of Reform; and in such a cause Quaker tranquillity rises to impassioned eloquence:

"Thus the Prince of Poets, as Hazlitt styled him," concludes Mr. Howitt, "sleeps in good company. The times in which he lived, and the part he took in them, were certain to load his name with obloquy and misrepresentation; but the solemn dignity of his life, and the lofty tone and principle of his writings, more and more suffice not only to vindicate him, but to commend him to posterity. No man ever loved liberty and virtue with a purer affection; no man ever laboured in their cause with a more distinguished zeal; no man ever brought to the task a more glorious genius, accomplished with a more consummate learning. Milton was the noblest model of a devoted patriot and true Englishman; and the study of his works is the most certain means of perpetuating to his country spirits worthy of her greatness."—Homes and Haunts of the Most Eminent British Poets, vol. i.

"Revolutions have approximated him to us," says Chateaubriand: "his political ideas make him a man of our own epoch. He complains in his verses that he came a century too late; he might have complained in his prose that he had come a century too early. The hour of his resurrection is now arrived. . . . Milton shook with a mighty hand all the ideas agitated in our own age. These ideas slept for one hundred and fifty years, and did not awake until 1798. Might it not be supposed that the political works of the poet were written in our times, on subjects which we see discussed every morning in the public papers? . . . We discern in Milton a man of troubled spirit; still under the influence of revolutionary scenes and passions, he stood erect after the downfall of that revolution which had fled to him for shelter and palpitated in his bosom. But the earnestness of that revolution overpowers him; religious gravity forms the counterpoise to his political agitations. Stunned, however, at the overthrow of his fondest illusions, at the dissipation of his dreams of liberty, he knows not which way to turn, but remains in a state of perplexity even respecting religious truth."—Sketches of Eng. Lit., ii. 31, 50, 148–149.

"Let us never think of Milton as a poet merely," observes Mr. Fletcher: "he was a citizen alive to all that was due from man to man in all the relations of life. He was invested with a power to mould the mind of a nation, and to lead the people into 'the glorious ways of truth and prosperous virtue.' He beheld tyranny and intolerance trampling upon the most sacred prerogatives of God and man: and he was compelled by the nobility of his nature, by the obligations of virtue, by the loud summons of beleaguered truth,—in short, by his patriotism as well as his piety,—to lay down the lyre and to adventure within the circle of peril and glory; and, buckling on the controversial panoply, he threw it off only when the various works of this volume, [Prose Works: see No. 5, ante,] surpassed by none in any sort of eloquence, became the record and trophy of his achievements and the worthy forerunners of those poems which a whole people 'will not willingly let die.'"—Introductory Review of Milton's Prose Works.

"One of Milton's characteristics," remarks Warton, "was a singular fortitude of mind, arising from a consciousness of superior abilities and a conviction that his cause was just."

We shall next quote the eloquent commendation of a countryman of our own, who refers touchingly to a deprivation the evils of which none than himself better knows how to estimate, and yet which his indomitable industry has so effectually overcome that the world has never felt itself to be a partner in the loss. There has been "day-labour, light denied," and the many "talents" have been "occupied" to a golden return.

"Indignant at every effort to crush the spirit, and to cheat it, in his own words, 'of that liberty which rarefies and enlightens it like the influence of heaven,' he proclaimed the rights of man as a rational immortal being, undismayed by menace and obloquy, amid a generation of servile and unprincipled sycophants. The blindness which excluded him from the things of earth opened to him more glorious and spiritualized conceptions of heaven, and aided him in exhibiting the full influence of those sublime truths which the privilege of free inquiry in religious matters had poured upon the mind."—WILLIAM H. PRESCOTT: Miscellanies, 1855, 273.

"We have now completed the history of John Milton," remarks Dr. Symmons,—"a man in whom have illustriously combined all the qualities that could adorn or could elevate the nature to which he belonged,—a man who at once possessed beauty of countenance, symmetry of form, elegance of manners, benevolence of temper, magnanimity and loftiness of soul, the brightest illumination of intellect, knowledge the most various and extended, virtue that never loitered in her career nor deviated from her course,—a man who, if he had been delegated as the representative of his species to one of the superior worlds, would have suggested a grand idea of the human race, as of beings affluent in moral and intellectual treasure, raised and distinguished in the universe as the favourites and heirs of Heaven."—Prefixed to Milton's Prose Works.

We have purposely reserved for the conclusion of this department of our subject the eulogium of an eminent living critic, who perhaps has done more to revive the popular interest in the works of his illustrious theme than any writer of the age:

"If ever despondency and asperity could be excused in any man, they might have been excused in Milton. But the strength of his mind overcame every calamity. Neither blindness, nor gout, nor age, nor penury, nor domestic afflictions, nor political disappointments, nor abuse, nor proscription, nor neglect, had power to disturb his sedate and majestic patience. His spirits do not seem to have been high, but they were singularly equable. His temper was serious, perhaps stern; but it was a temper which no sufferings could render sullen or fretful. Such as it was when, on the eve of great events, he returned from his travels, in the prime of health and manly beauty, loaded with literary distinctions and glowing with patriotic hopes, such it continued to be when, after having experienced every calamity which is incident to our nature, old, poor, sightless, and disgraced, he retired to his hovel to die. . . . There are a few characters which have stood the closest scrutiny and the severest tests, which have been tried in the furnace and have proved pure, which have been weighed in the balance and have not been found wanting, which have been declared sterling by the general consent of mankind, and which are visibly stamped with the image and superscription of the Most High. These great men we trust that we know how to prize; and of these was Milton. The sight of his books, the sound of his name, are pleasant to us. His thoughts resemble those celestial fruits and flowers which the Virgin Martyr of Massinger sent down from the gardens of Paradise to the earth, and which were distinguished from the productions of other soils, not only by superior bloom and sweetness, but by miraculous efficacy to invigorate and to heal. They are powerful not only to delight, but to elevate and purify. Nor do we envy the man who can study either the life or the writings of this great poet and patriot without aspiring to emulate, not indeed the sublime works with which his genius has enriched our literature, but the zeal with which he laboured for the public good, the fortitude with which he endured every private calamity, the lofty disdain with which he looked down on temptations and dangers, the deadly hatred which he bore to bigots and tyrants, and the faith which he so sternly kept with his country and with his fame."—LORD MACAULAY: Crit. and Hist. Essays, 1854, i. 27–28, 58.

Robert Southey said in 1827, and we say in 1857, and expect to say for another lustre at least, "A life of Milton is yet a desideratum in our literature."

We have already referred with just commendation to Mr. Keightley's creditable contribution recently given to the world,—An Account of the Life, Opinions, and Writings of John Milton, 1855, 8vo, pp. 484; but no one, we imagine, would be better pleased to see his volume supplanted by a comprehensive, elaborate, and exhaustive biography of the great bard than Mr. Keightley himself. But the biographer of Milton must be no ordinary man. He should be intimately acquainted with the history of the Commonwealth and the Restoration, yet no partisan; deeply versed in the literature of ancient Greece and Rome, of modern Italy, and of England, yet no pedant; a devout and fervid believer in the great truths of Christianity, yet no bigot. Thus qualified by nature, by education, and by heavenly wisdom, he will still fail to "reach the height of his great argument" without a profound conviction of human infirmity, and a consequent reliance on that "Eternal Spirit who can enrich with all utterance and knowledge, and sends out His Seraphim, with the hallowed fire of His altar, to touch and purify the lips of whom He pleases."

"But who is sufficient for these things?" Yet we shall not fail to look for such a biographer with some measure of a cheering hope; and when he appears we shall bow to him with only less reverence than we feel for the illustrious subject who elicits the best exertions of his mind and the warmest affections of his heart.

Since the above was prepared for the press, there has been announced a New Life of Milton, by Mr. David Masson, Professor of English Literature in University College, London, whose contributions to Miltonic literature we have already had occasion to notice. Vol. i. will comprehend the period from 1608 to 1639. We trust that Mr. Masson's success will be commensurate to his enterprise.

As for ourselves, whilst engaged in the erection of this humble temple to the genius, the virtue, the patriotism, and the piety of Milton, we have felt that we were occupying little less than hallowed ground; and, whilst arranging with anxious care the freewill offerings which the devotion of two centuries has cast into the treasury of letters, we have endeavoured to profit by the self-forgetful example of the builders of a greater edifice, where no sound of hammer or axe was heard, whilst in reverent silence the zealous labourers willingly gave themselves to their grateful toil.

His best-known publication is a tract called Reasons for Abolishing the Liquor-Traffic, addressed to the people of Virginia. Of this tract at least 30,000 copies have been sold. Minot, George, 1817–1858, son of Hon. Stephen Minot, was a native of Haverhill, Mass. "After the preparatory course of study at Phillips Exeter Academy, then under the charge of the celebrated Dr. Abbott, he entered Harvard College in 1832, and graduated with the class of 1836, and immediately commenced the study of law in the law-school at Cambridge, and afterwards continued his studies in the office of Hon. Rufus Choate, in Boston; where, after his admission to the bar in 1839, he commenced the practice of the law, where he continued to practise until his death.

"To the profession of his choice Mr. Minot devoted himself with faithful and successful assiduity; but he is more widely known by his editorial labours. He was the careful and accurate editor of the United States Statutes at Large from 1848 to '58. [The United States Statutes at Large from 1789 to 1855 can be had in 11 vols. r. 8vo, Boston; only complete edit., $44.] He also rendered valuable assistance to Mr. Peters in the preparation of the first eight volumes of the Statutes, published in 1848, the full and complete general index of which was the exclusive result of his labours. His name is also familiar to the profession as associate reporter of the decisions of Judge Woodbury, in the First Circuit Court; and his edition of the nine volumes of English Admiralty Reports, republished by Little & Brown in 1853, bears evidence of his industry and learning in this branch of his profession. In 1844, he edited the work which has made his name familiar to every Massachusetts lawyer,—the Digest of the Decisions of the Supreme Court of that State, [Mass., 17 vols.; Pickering, 24 vols.; Metcalf, 4 vols.,] 1 vol. r. 8vo; to which he added a Supplement in 1852, r. 8vo; and, until compelled by the state of his health to lay aside his labours, he was intending to recast the entire work, and, including the later reports, to make it more completely useful to the profession, more just to his own reputation and that of the court whose learning and ability it would illustrate." Judge Minot was one of the founders of this useful and honourable society, and edited three volumes of their Collections. See notices of Judge Minot in Loring's Hundred Boston Orators, 1854, iii. 128, 146, 250, 328; Frank Moore's Amer. Eloquence, 1857, i. 551, 552; Mass. Histor. Collec., viii. 89–109.

Minot, Laurence, an English poet of the fourteenth century, unknown to Leland, Bale, Pits, and Tanner, was discovered by Tyrwhitt towards the close of the eighteenth century, and his poems were edited by Joseph Ritson, Lon., 1795, cr. 8vo; 2d ed., 1825, cr. 8vo. As the poems appear to have been written in 1362, we must assign to Minot priority to Chaucer and Gower. Ritson praises Minot extravagantly; but he must be allowed to possess a flowing and perspicuous style. See Ritson's ed.; Crit. Rev., 1797; Brit. Crit., 1797.

Minsheu, John, Professor of Languages in London in the latter part of the sixteenth century, pub. several philological works, of which the best-known is Ductor in Linguas: The Guide into the [11] Tongues,—viz.: English, British or Welsh, Low Dutch, High Dutch, French, Italian, Spanish, Portuguez, Latine, Greeke, Hebrew, &c., Lon., 1617, fol. Preferred to the other edit., being more correct.

Mitchel, O. M., b. in Union county, Kentucky, 1810; graduated in the Artillery Corps at West Point Military Academy, 1829, and in the same year was appointed Assistant Professor of Mathematics in that institution,—a post which he retained until 1831. He was subsequently employed in the survey of several railroads, practised law at Cincinnati from 1832 to '34, and, in the latter year, opened a scientific school. In 1836, he became Professor of Mathematics, Philosophy, and Astronomy in the Cincinnati College. The Cincinnati Observatory owes its origin to this enthusiastic and enterprising votary of science. The corner-stone was laid, in 1843, by John Quincy Adams, and the building completed in 1845, when Professor Mitchel, the Director, took up his residence there and made his first observation on the transit of Mercury. His magnetic clock was first offered to the inspection of his friends in 1848; and in 1849 he added another contribution to science by his new declination-apparatus. See Men of the Time, N. York, 1852, 362. "It is at once a true man and a scholar: his eloquence, which gushes forth at times as a flood, could only issue from the depth of a large heart; while its illustrations are such as he alone who has become thoroughly imbued with the best of the world's literature could supply."—Southern Literary Messenger.

"True feeling, refinement, purity, and elegance of style are the prominent characteristics of this delightful and admirably-executed volume."—Knickerbocker.

"All the critics praise it as one of the choicest specimens of half romance and half essay that has appeared in our time."—International Magazine.

Mr. Mitchell's works are pub. in uniform style in 8 vols. 12mo. The aggregate sale in America of his writings had reached 75,000 vols. by the year 1856.

"His prose is graphic and musical; poetical in spirit, and characterized by purity as well as tenderness of feeling."—GEO. S. HILLARD: First-Class Reader, 1856, 88.

"An author who possesses a singular facility of style, and who writes with much pathos, though deficient sometimes in power and boldness."—Kent's Course of Eng. Reading, Oakley's ed., 1853, 108.

"It has been remarked that the study of Irving's sketches has left traces of imitation too evident in the writings of Mitchell. His style has in many passages a certain charm of dreamy quietude and pleasurable pensiveness; but when we have read a few pages we have a desire to vary the time, or, indeed, to change the key-note. The author of Dream Life might be compared with a musician who knows little of the resources of modulation and attempts to write a symphony on a few simple chords in one scale. It seems strange to find in American books by young authors a want of the freshness and variety of life. Pathos has its place in fiction, but should leave room for other moods of mind."—Hand-Book of Amer. Lit., Hist., Biog., and Crit., 1856, 188.

"Mr. Mitchell does not bear reading from cover to cover. The want of sustained interest in his books, and the very fragmentary manner in which he arranges them, are indeed unfavourable to a continued perusal. . . . There is a sameness about their very perfections that wearies us as we go on. They are the champaign lands of sentiment,—beautiful levels, over which an hour's gallop or a day's meditation is charming. But to stay there for any length of time induces terrible lassitude and mental depression. This arises from the almost feminine delicacy of Mr. Mitchell's nature."—Putnam's Mag., Jan., 1853, 74–78: Our Young Authors.

It is understood that whilst Mr. Mitchell was United States Consul at Venice, in 1853, he collected materials for a projected history of Venice. The undertaking is an ambitious one, and may well "give him pause;" but we trust that he will not be dismayed by the difficulties of the task,—which no historical student, indeed, is likely to underrate.

"Few papers, it is believed, will be read with more interest, particularly when it is considered how extremely important Dr. Rush viewed them as affording him new facts respecting the nature of the same epidemic at the time it prevailed in Philadelphia in 1793."—*Thacher's Amer. A layman is of course entitled to no opinion upon professional theories of this character; but a learned physician of our own city, upon whom we are accustomed greatly to rely, both in sickness and in health, (Dr. John K. Mitchell, of Philadelphia, post,) assures us that the yellow-fever speculations of both Dr. Mitchell and Dr. Rush are now banished to the tomb of the Capulets. We do not profess to give his language, but are not far from the sentiment. Mitchell, John Kearsley, M.D., a son of Alexander Mitchell, M.D., was born in Shepherdstown, Jefferson county, Virginia, May 12, 1798. At eight years of age he was sent to Europe to be educated, and received a part of his education in Edinburgh. At seventeen he returned to America, and in the year 1819, being then twenty-one years of age, graduated in Medicine at the University of Pennsylvania. In 1817–18, before the reception of his degree, he made, chiefly for his health, a voyage to China as surgeon of the ship George and Albert, Captain E. M. Donaldson. At Canton he wrote an account of a curious case of monstrosity, published in the Philadelphia Medical and Physical Journal, 1821–22, p. 78. After graduation, he made two voyages to the East Indies. In 1822, he married a daughter of Alexander Henry, of Philadelphia, and became a practitioner of medicine in Philadelphia, where he has followed his profession ever since. In 1824, he began to lecture on The Institutes of Medicine and Physiology in the Philadelphia Medical Institute. In 1826, he filled the chair of Chemistry in the same Institution. In 1833, he was appointed to the chair of Chemistry of the Franklin Institute, and for five years thereafter delivered annually a course of lectures on Chemistry applied to Medicine, and another course of lectures on Chemistry applied to the Arts. In the spring of 1841, he was chosen, by the trustees of the Jefferson Medical College, Prof. of the Practice of Medicine, the chair of which he has filled to the present time, (1858.) 1. Dr. Mitchell is the author of a number of printed lectures, of several articles in The (Philadelphia) Religious Souvenir, Graham's Magazine, The Philadelphia Book, &c., and the editor of the American edition of R. W. Bampfield's work On Curvatures and Diseases of the Spine: see p. 109 of this Dictionary. See also a biographical notice of Dr. Mitchell, by Joseph C. Neal, in Graham's Magazine, August, 1845; and a Biographical Sketch of Prof. J. K. Mitchell, M.D., in The Charleston Medical Journal and Review, Jan. 1858, 122–127.

Since our notice of Dr. Mitchell was prepared for the press, he has been added to the large number of those recorded in this volume who have passed from the scenes of their labours to the world of spirits. He died on the 4th of April, 1858. Many of our readers, as they read these lines, will silently endorse the truth of the remark of one of his biographers, that "those who know him as the delightful companion of the drawing-room and fireside will bear willing witness how largely the affection and esteem of friends is added to that honorable respect which has so deservedly crowned a long life spent in the faithful and efficient discharge of numerous public trusts."—Charleston Med. Jour.: ubi supra.

"He seems to have been a poet of the third rate: he has seldom reached the sublime: his humour, in which he more succeeded, is not strong enough to last; his versification holds a state of mediocrity; he possessed but little invention; and, if he was not a bad rhimester, he cannot be denominated a fine poet, for there are but few marks of genius in his writings."—Cibber's Lives.

Mitchell, Maria, b. 1818, in the island of Nantucket, Massachusetts, daughter of William and Lydia C. Mitchell, has written, besides other astronomical papers, a memoir communicated to the Smithsonian Institute at Washington, on the subject of a telescopic comet discovered by her, Oct. 1, 1847. For this discovery she received a prize gold medal from the late King of Denmark. Miss Mitchell sailed for Europe, July 22, 1857, for the purpose of visiting the principal observatories and astronomers of the Old World. In her absence, a subscription has been started for the purchase of an observatory on Nantucket Island, to be presented to her on her return, as a proper testimonial of respect for her intelligent zeal in astronomical investigations. The example of Mary Somerville, Agnes Catlow, Jane Marcet, Maria Mitchell, and Hannah M. Bouvier (author of Familiar Astronomy, Phila., 1857, 8vo, pp. 499) should be a powerful stimulus to their sex to the cultivation of the exact sciences.

Mitchell, Thomas. Tables of Interest, 12mo.

Mitchell, Thomas, 1783–1845, one of the most eminent of modern Grecians, the son of a riding-master of London, was entered of Pembroke College, Oxford, in 1802; took his degree of B.A. in 1806, and received a silver cup of the value of thirty guineas for his remarkable scholarship; gained an open fellowship in Sidney Sussex College in 1809. His literary labours comprise a series of papers, on Aristophanes and Athenian manners, in the London Quarterly Review, (viz., pub. 1813–31, No. xvii., Art. 9; xlii., 1; xliii. 9; xlv. 12; xlviii. 8; liv. 6; lviii. 2; lxvi. 3; lxxxviii. 3;) a translation into English verse of some of the Comedies of Aristophanes, 1820–22, 2 vols. 8vo; editions of five of the plays of Aristophanes, with English Notes, for the use of schools and universities, 1835–40, (The Acharnenses, 1835, 8vo; Wasps, Clouds, 1838, 8vo; Frogs, 1840, 8vo;) editions of the plays of Sophocles, (Tyrannus, 1840, 8vo; Œdipus Jolonœus, 1841, 8vo; Antigone, 1842, 8vo; Electra, 1843, 8vo; Ajax, 1844, 8vo; Philoctetes, 1844, 8vo; Trachiniæ, 1844, 8vo; Tragœdiæ, 1844, 2 vols. 8vo;) Indices of the Greek Orators and Plato; supervision of a number of classical works issued from the Clarendon Press, Oxford. Mitchell's editions of the plays of Aristophanes were attacked by the Rev. G. J. Kennedy, Fellow of St. John's College, Cambridge. To these strictures Mitchell pub. a reply in 1841.

"He is really thoroughly Atticised," remarks a sprightly critic. "His learning is not like learning: it has lost the appearance of having been acquired; it seems part of his nature: he lives and moves in an atmosphere of Greek. . . . But his translation, [of Aristophanes,] though so very able, is a failure,—a clear proof of how impossible, after all, it is to turn Greek poetry into English or make our language convey the ideas of Athens."—Extracts from the Portfolio of a Man of the World: Lon. Gent. Mag., 1846, Pt. 1, 583.

"Let him drop a few prejudices, and the general tone of his work will be more pleasing: let him bestow a little more pains, and its general execution will be more correct. For what we have said in commendation, we think the extracts we have given will fully justify us to our classical readers. We hail with much satisfaction the prospect now afforded us of seeing ably and agreeably translated into our native language an author who has hitherto had so much fewer readers and admirers than his merits deserve."—Sir D. K. Sandford: Edin. Rev., xxxiv. 255–319, Nov. 1820: The Comedies of Aristophanes, vol. i. 1820, pp. 454.

"Since the publication of Mr. Mitford, [see Mitford, William, M.P.,] nothing has appeared so calculated to convey a true impression of the character of antiquity, or to efface those theatrical and pedantic notions which are become the source not only of infinite absurdity and distortion of mind among scholars, but of much practical mischief and error in proportion as the blunders of the learned are diffused among the vulgar."—Lon. Quar. Rev., xxiii. 471–505.

"I never saw any man wield the whole armoury of erudition with so little appearance either of being chilled or loaded. Mr. Mitchell is really a graceful scholar."—Extracts from Wastle's Diary: Blackw. Mag., vii. 317. See also 667.

"His volume is a valuable addition to the library of every classical scholar."—Blackw. Mag., xxiii. 551. See also xxxiv. 138–139.

"Aristophanes is much obliged to Mr. Mitchell. Until this accomplished gentleman took up the cause of the old Greek Comedy, we believe that a majority even of literary persons amongst us were content to think of it according to the fashion of those egregious judges of antiquity, the French. . . . For much of the wholesome change of sentiment here noticed, Aristophanes, we say again, must thank the rare ability and elegant scholarship lavished on his works by one who, it is pleasant to add, seems as fresh and zealous as ever in the service."—Edin. Rev., lxi. 323–341: The Acharnenses, 1835, 18mo.

"We recognize in Mr. Mitchell's annotated edition of the Acharnenses (the first only, we hope, of a complete series of that poet's comedies) Aristophanes' profound and varied erudition, combined with manly and sagacious views of life and manners, and an English style not easily to be surpassed for clearness, energy, or grace."—Lon. Quar. Rev., li. 42, n.

"We quote from the Preface to Mr. Mitchell's edition of the Wasps of Aristophanes,—the second of a series which we are not afraid to say will form, when completed, something like an epoch in the history of British scholarship."—Ibid., lv. 21, n.

Mr. Mitchell has been blamed for a want of relevancy in some of his notes in the works edited by him, and especially for the obtrusive display of his aristocratic predilections in contradistinction to the democratical character of a portion of his text. His Preliminary Discourse (pp. 160) to the Comedies of Aristophanes has elicited warm commendations by its eloquence of style and critical acumen. The Greek student must not fail to study it carefully; and he can then profitably peruse the following critical papers on and translations from Ἀριστοφάνης φιλιππίδου, (we do not mean to defend the authenticity of the bust:) Comedies: Lon. Mitchell, Lieut.-Col. Sir Thomas Livingstone, Knt., R.A., 1792–1855, the son of John Mitchell, Esq., of Craigend, Stirlingshire, Scotland, entered the British army in Portugal in 1808; served on the staff till the termination of the Peninsular War, when he had attained the rank of major; spent some time under Government orders in making surveys of the great battle-fields of the Continent, and drew up a series of military maps of great value, now in the Ordnance-Office; in 1827 became Deputy-Surveyor-General, and, on the death of Mr. Oxley, Surveyor-General, of New South Wales, and, in this capacity, made four expeditions into the interior of the Australian continent,—viz., in 1831–32, 1835, 1836, 1845–46. Sir Thomas was advanced to the rank of colonel in 1854. He died in October of the next year at his residence near Sydney, New South Wales. His publications were as follows: 1. Outlines of a System of Surveying for Geographical and Military Purposes, Lon., 1827, 8vo. 2. Map of the Colony of New South Wales, &c., in Three Sheets: pub. shortly before the publication of No. 3. 3. Mitchill, Samuel Latham, M.D., LL.D., 1764–1831, a native of North Hampstead, (Plandome,) Queen's county, Long Island; studied medicine in New York, 1780–83, and in Edinburgh, 1783–87; appointed Professor of Chemistry, Natural History, and Philosophy in Columbia College, 1792; in conjunction with Drs. Edward Miller (ante) and Elihu H. Smith, (post,) established the New York Medical Repository, 1797, and was its chief editor for more than sixteen years; married to Mrs. Catherine Cock, daughter of Samuel Akerly, 1799; elected a member of the United States House of Representatives, 1800; in 1804, of the Senate of the United States, and re-elected, at the expiration of his Senatorial term in 1809, to the House; appointed the first Professor of Chemistry in the College of Physicians and Surgeons of the City of New York, 1807, but declined the office; accepted the professorship of Botany and Materia Medica in the same institution on its reorganization in 1820, and retained this post until the resignation of all the professors (see FRANCIS, JOHN W., M.D., LL.D.) in 1826. Dr. Mitchill filled a number of important public posts in addition to those here enumerated, and was a zealous promoter of the prosperity of his adopted State. Among the many philanthropic works which praise him in the gates is his agency in the establishment of the Lyceum of Natural History of New York, founded by Drs. Mitchill, Torrey, Townsend, and a few others. Among Dr. Mitchill's publications are: 1. Life of Tammany, the Indian Chief, N. York, 1795, 8vo. 2. Remarks on the Gaseous Oxide of Azote, 1795, 18mo. 3. Observations on the Geology of America. 4. Picture of New York, 1807, 12mo. 5. Description of Schooley's Mountain in New Jersey, 1810, 8vo. 6. Discourse before the New York Historical Society, 1813. Of Dr. Mitchill's poetical essays, the best-known, perhaps, are his translations of the third and fifth of the Piscatory Eclogués of Sannazarius.

"Of his numerous writings, a large part relate to subjects of transient interest or of technical science. These we shall neither attempt to enumerate nor to characterize. Among his most elaborate productions are his addresses before the State Agricultural Societies; his correspondence with Priestley; his Chart of Chemical Nomenclature; his Introduction to Darwin's Zoonomia; his paper on the Alkaline Properties of the Waters of the Ocean, in the American Philosophical Transactions; his Discourse before the New York Historical Society on the Botanical History of North and South America; a paper on the Fishes that Inhabit the Waters of New York, in the Transactions of the Literary and Historical Society of New York; his Appendix to Cuvier's History of the Earth; his biographical Discourses on Dr. Bard and on Thomas A. Emmet. . . . In assigning to Dr. Mitchill an eminent rank among the cultivators of natural science, we are fully warranted by the authority of those who have pre-eminently excelled in this branch of knowledge. The illustrious Cuvier, both in his lectures and in his writings, referred to him in terms of signal approbation. More recently, the ornithologist Audubon bestowed upon him the tribute of his applause."—JOHN W. FRANCIS, M.D.: Life of Dr. Mitchill, in Williams's Amer. Med Biog., 401–411.

Dr. Francis—Mitchill's friend and biographer—still "lives, a prosperous gentleman," and has within the last few weeks repeated the praises of his former colleague in a most interesting Discourse in Commemoration of the Fifty-Third Anniversary of the New York Historical Society and of the Dedication of their New Edifice, November 17, 1857: see pp. 56–60, 226; and see the 2d ed. of this Discourse,—Old New York, 1858, 87, 90, 93, 94, 95, 339, 351, 368, 372. See also Duyckincks' Cyc. of Amer. Lit., i. 517–524; Dr. Mitchill's pamphlet entitled Some of the Memorable Events and Occurrences in the Life of Samuel L. Dr. Samuel Akerly—Dr. Mitchill's brother-in-law—left in MS. a biographical account, almost completed, of the subject of our notice. As the biographer died in 1845, and we write thirteen years later, (1858,) we naturally presume that there must be negligence somewhere, or this Life would long since have been given to the world.

"I cannot refrain from adding, as the greatest encouragement to all of you who are just commencing your professional career, that Lord Redesdale's Treatise on Pleading was written by a man who had been trained in a solicitor's office, but by study and persevering industry, æquabiliter et diligenter, (as his own motto describes it,) rose to be Lord-Chancellor of Ireland. It was composed, moreover, not for ambition or for profit, but simply in the course of his duties for the education of another man, at that time only his pupil, and who profited so greatly by its profound learning, and gained from it such a thorough knowledge of sound principles, that, not long after the retirement of his gifted instructor, that pupil succeeded him in the same distinguished office: I mean the present Lord Manners."—*Walpole's Lects. on Equity at the Lon. "It is a wonderful effort to collect what is to be deduced from authorities speaking so little what is clear; and the surprise is, not from the difficulty of understanding all that he has said, but that so much can be understood."—LORD ELDON, C.: Lloyd v. Johnes, 9 Ves., 54.

"To no authority, living or dead, can reference be had with more propriety for correct information respecting the principles by which courts of equity are governed, than to one whose knowledge and experience enabled him, fifty years ago, to reduce the whole subject to a system with such an universally-acknowledged learning, accuracy, and discrimination as to have been ever since received by the whole profession as an authoritative standard and guide."—SIR THOMAS PLUMER: Cholmondeley v. Clinton, 2 Jacob & Walker, 151.

In our notice of Charles Fearne's Contingent Remainders (p. 583 of this Dictionary) we quote a eulogy on that work from Judge Story, concluding with "without venturing to touch the sacred fabrick of his master." We now continue the quotation from the point where we left off:

"The treatise of Lord Redesdale on Pleadings in Chancery is of the same masterly and original character. It has traced out the nature and extent of the jurisdiction and practice of courts of chancery with so much brevity, perspicuity, and analytical exactness, that probably to this more than any other work we owe some of the most valuable improvements in the principles as well as the proceedings which regulate the administration of equity."—N. Amer. Rev., vi. 55, Nov. 1817: Hoffman's Course of Legal Study.

Nearly twenty years after the above was written (i.e. in 1836) Judge Story pub. the first two vols. of his commentaries on Equity Jurisprudence. Into this great work he transferred the most of Mitford's treatise, and generally in the language of the author, which, he remarks,

"I have not the presumption to think I could improve, and from which I have rarely deviated, except to insist upon some qualification or to make his text occasionally more definite and clear."

On page 22 of vol. i., 6th ed., 1853, he styles Lord Redesdale "one of the ablest judges that ever sat in Equity;" and he considers his lordship's "general account" of a court of equity "far more satisfactory as a definite enumeration than the outline of Mr. Justice Blackstone," (pp. 30–31.)

"That great lawyer," remarks Mr. Sheil of Lord Redesdale, "introduced a reformation in Irish practice. He substituted great learning, unwearied diligence, and a spirit of scientific discussion for the flippant apothegms and irritable self-sufficiency of the late Lord Clare. He entertained an honourable passion for the study as well as for the profits of his profession; and, not satisfied with pronouncing judgments which adjusted the rights of the immediate parties, he disclosed the foundations of his decisions, and, opening the deep ground-work of equity, revealed the principles upon which the whole edifice is established."—Sketches of the Irish Bar, Dr. R. S. Mackenzie's ed., N. York, 1854, i. 228.

Mitford, Mary Russell, 1786–1855, a native of Alresford, Hampshire, was the daughter of a physician, who possessed a remarkable facility in dissipating large amounts of money, and ran through several fortunes, in addition to one of £20,000—the produce of a lottery-ticket—which he presented to Mary on her tenth birthday. His daughter, however, was devotedly attached to this modern Murad the Unlucky,—for such he was, notwithstanding the good fortune just mentioned,—and cheerfully and assiduously plied her pen to repair the breaches made by paternal improvidence.

"When Mary Russell Mitford, whose heart was in her tragedies, sat up late into many a summer morning to finish and polish those more marketable prose sketches which she was compelled by the extravagance of others to produce, (such being the real facts of the origin of 'Our Village,') she little dreamed that by labour so compulsory and so little prized she was laying the first stone of a library of literature, and setting a pattern which some score of men, women, and children in England and America would find a profit in imitating. The tale and the catalogue would fill a page in the 'Accidents of Authorship.'"—Lon. Athenæum, 1857, 1447: Our Old Town, by Thomas Miller.

Miss Mitford's own words are as follows:

"The pressing necessity of earning money, and the uncertainties and delays of the drama at moments when disappointment or delay weighed upon me like a sin, made it a duty to turn away from the lofty steep of Tragic Poetry to the every-day path of Village Stories."

Our Village was by no means Miss Mitford's first literary essay, as the following list of her productions proves: 1. Miscellaneous Verses, 1806. 2. Christina, the Maid of the South Seas, 1811; 1811, 8vo. This poetic narrative, in the style of Scott, is founded upon the story of the Mutiny of the Bounty. 3. Blanche, 1806. This is a Spanish story, and of the same character as the work just named. 4. Poems, 1810, fp. 8vo, pp. 144. This collection contains Sybille, a Northumbrian Tale, and a number of minor poems. A second ed., with addits., was pub. 1811, 8vo.

"In our cursory examination of this little volume we have noticed several unpoetical and ungraceful, and not a few ungrammatical, lines. It must be apparent, we think, to every one that Miss Mitford's taste and judgment are not yet matured; that her poems ought to have been kept back much longer and revised much oftener before they were submitted to the public; and, above all, that she wanted some friend who, without wounding her feelings or damping the fire of her genius, would have led her to correcter models of taste and taught her more cautious habits of composition. That such instruction would not have been thrown away we judge from many pleasing passages scattered through her little volume, which do no discredit to the amiableness of her mind and the cultivation of her talents. When she attempts to describe the higher passions, as in Sybille, she fails from want of strength for the flight. But in the description of natural scenery or the delineation of humbler and calmer feelings she is more successful. The following lines form part of a poem written in a favourite arbour, and are a pleasing imitation of the style and subject of Grongar Hill:

'How slowly swells the limpid flood!

[Quotation ending with the line

"How fair this living picture gleams!"—p. 45.]

"Passages of equal or superior merit might be collected from the volume amply sufficient to show that, with better advice and more mature deliberation, Miss Mitford's muse would not sing unheard or unattended; but we can have little hope of this if she does not forever forsake the thorny and barren field of politics, so unfavourable to the laurel of Parnassus."—WILLIAM GIFFORD: Lon. Quar. Rev., iv. 514–519, Nov. 1810.

This review is ascribed, by a correspondent of the Lon. Gentleman's Mag., (1844, Pt. 1, 138,) to the Rev. John Mitford; and the writer remarks, in a note, "erroneously ascribed to Sir W. Scott in Lockhart's Life of Sir Walter:" whereas if Miss Mitford is correct both these gentlemen are mistaken:

"Mr. Gifford," she remarks, referring to this "deserved castigation," (so she styles it,) "afterwards made amends for the severity of his strictness on the young girl's book by giving a very favourable and kindly notice of the first series of 'Our Village.'"—Introduc. to her Dramat. Works, 1854. See No. 7.

We quote a few lines on this volume (2d ed.) from another reviewer:

"Miss Mitford excels in her description of local scenery, for the attractions of which she appears to possess that genuine taste which indicates an accomplished and commonly a virtuous mind."—Lon. Critical Rev.

5. Watlington Hill; a Poem, 1812, 8vo. 6. Narrative Poems on the Female Character in Different Relations in Life, 1812, vol. i., 8vo. 7. Our Village: Sketches of Rural Character and Scenery. Pub. in the Lady's Magazine, 1819. These charming sketches were offered to Thomas Campbell for the New Monthly Magazine, and rejected by him as unsuitable to the dignity of his pages. They were subsequently pub. in five series, in 5 vols.,—viz.: i., 1824; ii., 1826; iii., 1828; iv., 1830; v., 1832. New eds. of the whole, 1843, cr. 8vo; 1848, 2 vols. p. 8vo; 1852; 1856, 2 vols. imp. 8vo. See preceding comments from the Athenæum, 1817, 1447.

"Every one now knows 'Our Village;' and every one knows that the nooks and corners, the haunts and the copses, so delightfully described in its pages, will be found in the immediate neighbourhood of Reading, and more especially around 'Three-Mile Cross,' a cluster of cottages on the Basingstoke Road, in one of which our authoress has now resided for many years."—H. F. Chorley's Authors of England: Mary Russell Mitford, 1837.

"We have no passion for 'breaking a butterfly upon the wheel,' and should not notice this little volume if we were not on the whole pleased with its contents. The sketches of country scenery in which it abounds have such a convincing air of locality, the human figures interspersed among them are touched in such a laughter-loving, good-humoured spirit of caricature, innocent, and yet often pungent withal, that we scarcely know a more agreeable portfolio of trifles for the amusement of an idle hour. Abundant matter for small criticism, indeed, might be found in the details of the work. . . . We have taken the trouble of making these observations, because Miss Mitford is capable of better things; and we have no doubt that our hints will not be thrown away on her."—WILLIAM GIFFORD: Lon. Quar. Rev., xxxi. 166–174, Dec. 1824. (Review of Series First.)

"Miss Mitford's elegant little volume is just in unison with the time: it is a gallery of pictures, landscapes, fresh, glowing, and entirely English; portraits,—likenesses, we doubt not,—all simply but sweetly coloured: in short, a book to make us forget the hurry, the bustle, the noise around, in the leaves, tall old trees, and rich meadows of her delightful Village."—Lon. Lit. Gaz.

"This is an engaging volume, full of feeling, spirit, and vivacity; and the descriptions of rural scenery and rural life are vivid and glowing."—Lon. New Month. Mag.

"These 'Sketches,' we are of opinion, will ere long be extremely popular; for they are highly-finished ones, and evince infinite taste, judgment, and feeling. They are somewhat in the manner of Geoffrey Crayon, but, to our liking, are far more interesting."—Lon. Examiner.

"TICKLER. 'Master Christopher North, there's Miss Mitford, author of "Our Village," an admirable person in all respects, of whom you have never, to my recollection, taken any notice in the Magazine. What is the meaning of that? Is it an oversight? Or have you omitted her name intentionally from your eulogies on our female worthies?'

"NORTH. 'I am waiting for her second volume. Miss Mitford has not, in my opinion, either the pathos or the humour of Washington Irvine; but she excels him in vigorous conception of character and in the truth of her pictures of English life and manners. Her writings breathe a sound, pure, and healthy morality, and are pervaded by a genuine rural spirit,—the spirit of merry England. Every line bespeaks the lady.'

"SHEPHERD. 'I admire Miss Mitford just excessively. I dinna wunnur at her being able to write sae weel as she does about drawing-rooms wi' sofas and settees, and about the fine folks in them, seein' themsells in lookin'-glasses frae tap to tae; but what puzzles the like o' me is her pictures o' poachers, and tinklers, and pottery trampers, and ither ne'er-do-weels, and o' huts and hovels without riggin' by the way-side, and the cottages o' honest puir men, and byres, and barns, and stack-yards, and merry-makins at winter-ingles, and courtship aneath trees and at the gabel-ends o' farm-houses atween lads and lasses as laigh in life as the servants in her father's ha'. That's the puzzle, and that's the praise. But ae word explains a',—Genius! Genius! Wull a' the metafhizzians in the warld ever expound that mysterious monysyllable?'

"TICKLER. 'Monosyllable, James, did ye say?'

"SHEPHERD. 'Ay, Monysyllable! Does na that mean a wurd o' three syllables?'

"TICKLER. 'It's all one in the Greek, my dear James.'"—Noctes Ambros., No. XXIX., Nov. 1826: Blackw. Mag., xx. 780–781.

"NORTH. 'That charming painter of rural life,—Miss Mitford.'

"SHEPHERD. 'Oh, sir, but that leddy has in truth a fine and bauld haund, either at a sketch or finished picture.'"—Noctes Ambros., No. XXXIX., Nov. 1828: Blackw. Mag., xxvi. 673.

We shall allow the Shepherd one more opportunity of expressing his ardent admiration of Miss Mitford:

"SHEPHERD. 'I'm just verra fond o' that lassie Mitford. She has an ee like a hawk's, that misses naething, however far aff, and yet like a dove's, that sees only what is nearest and dearest and round about the hame-circle o' its central nest. I'm just excessive fond o' Miss Mitford.'

"TICKLER. 'Fond is not the right word, James.'

"SHEPHERD. 'It is the richt word, Timothy. . . . I'm fond o' a' gude female writers. They're a' bonnie, and every passage they write carries, as it ought to do, their feminitye alang wi' it. The young gentlemen o' England should be ashamed o' theirsells for letting her name be Mitford. They should marry her whether she wull or no, for she would mak baith a useful and agreeable wife. That's the best creetishism on her warks.'"—Noctes Ambros., No. XLI., March, 1829: Blackw. Mag., xxv. 380.

"Those who have read Miss Mitford's former volumes of Sketches (and those who have not are ignorant of one of the most efficacious cures that we know of for ennui) will be glad to learn that, after a lapse of two years, 'Our Village' has undergone but few changes. Let us walk through it with our fair guide and see how matters go on there. . . . From these extracts the reader can form no other than a favourable opinion of Miss Mitford's second volume. We may assure him that he will find it an extremely delightful book in its way, and that he may turn its pages over and over again without being tired of them."—Lon. Month. Rev., Nov. 1826, 316–326. (Review of Series Second.)

"In the very first page [of The Amulet] right happy are we once more to meet with that most lively and picturesque of living writers, the favourite of everybody who feels an interest in the quiet charms of rural and domestic life. Need we name Miss Mitford? Her verses, to-be-sure, have not often gained much praise from us; nor are we among the enthusiastic admirers of her tragedy."—Ibid., Nov. 1827, 349. (Review of The Amulet for 1828.)

"It is with a feeling of gratification equal to that with which we have just perused this pleasing addition to 'Our Village' annals, we are here enabled to repeat our favourable opinion of their style and character, of their simplicity, taste, and originality. With equal pretensions in other points, they indisputably boast more variety and more discrimination of character than the Sketches in the preceding volume, while they aspire to a higher class. They open wider and more general views of rural life, and peculiarities of temper and disposition in the more elevated rustics around the village, in particular towards the close of its history,—even more than we were entitled to look for from the simple plan and promise given in the outset and in the whole of the former volume."—Lon. New Month. Mag., Nov. 1826. (Review of Series Second.)

The conclusion of the series of Our Village is thus announced by the London Monthly Review:

"We have now before us her fifth volume of 'Our Village;' and neatly half bound, in a book-case behind our chair, are her four preceding volumes. We have read them over and over; and, when the winter evenings come, it is not at all improbable that we shall read them over again. Her Village Sketches are always new to us. We open any page, and go on with that sort of delight which we experience only when we happen to light on the Spectator or the Rambler. We would not exchange these five volumes for all the novels put together that have been published in London during the past five years. There are many of the sketches in this volume which we have read not long since in the Annuals and other publications. But what of that? Here they are again: and right glad are we to meet such agreeable acquaintances. . . . Farewell, then, once more, Mary! May the remainder of thy days flow on in peace, in happiness! Honour and fame will be thine, at all events; for thy pages, to our thinking, realize the fable of the East: they are rich in the enjoyment of immortal youth, and destined never to know a wrinkle or grey hair. Ever smiling with fresh bloom, ever fair to look upon and delicious to remember, these five volumes will endure as long as the true idiomatic character of our language shall be understood and appreciated; and, even when that decays, they will still be loved for the beautiful benevolence, the true taste, the genuine complexion of nature, which they exhibit with an uniformity that nature only could bestow."—October, 1832, 265–284.

"'Our Village' is one of the books destined to be always read. Buy it and give it to your daughter, and it will improve her mind and cultivate her heart."—Lon. Athen.

The Foscari and Julian were subsequently pub. together in an 8vo volume. 10. Dramatic Scenes, Sonnets, and other Poems, 1827, 8vo. This vol. contains The Siege, Cunigunda's Vow, The Painter's Daughter, The Fawn, Emily, Alice, The Bridal Eve, Henry Talbot, and other pieces.

"The productions of this very pleasing and talented writer, in particular of the dramatic kind, have of late, as we long since predicted, begun to be favourably distinguished above the standard of similar compositions. Her powers, though not of a first-rate order, she employs to the best advantage, and always under the regulation of good taste, genuine simplicity, and natural feeling."—Lon. Month. Mag., June, 1827, 235.

11. Rienzi; a Tragedy, 1828. First performed in 1828. Successful. 12. Charles the First; a Tragedy. Coleman refused to license this play, and it was therefore brought out at the Coburg theatre. Successful. 13. Stories of American Life by American Writers, 3 vols. p. 8vo. Contents: I. Otter Bag; II. The French Village; III. The Country Cousin; IV. The Esmeralda; V. The Indian-Hater; VI. Pete Featherton; VII. The Drunkard; VIII. The Marriage Blunder; IX. Romance of the Border; X. The Ghost; XI. The Seaman's Widow; XII. Scenes in Washington; XIII. The Catholic Iroquois; XIV. The Captain's Lady; XV. The Fawn's Leap; XVI. The Little Dutch Sentinel; XVII. The Rifle, &c. These volumes have already been noticed in our life of WASHINGTON IRVING, p. 944 of this Dictionary. 14. American Stories for Children above Ten Years of Age; 2d Series, 1832, 3 vols. 18mo. Contents: I. The Sea-Voyage; II. The Canadian Travellers; III. The New England Farm-House; IV. The Talisman, &c. Noticed in Lon. Athen., 1832, lx. 15. Belford Regis; or, Sketches of a Country Town, 1835, 3 vols. p. 8vo; 1846, 12mo, (Stand. Novels, cii.;) also 1849, 12mo. The materials of this work are drawn from the town of Reading, not far from Swallowfield Cottage,—Miss Mitford's residence. 16. Country Stories, 1837, p. 8vo; and in The Parlour Library, vol. xxxix., 1847.

"This may be received as a supplementary volume either to Our Village or Belford Regis, according to the purchaser's pleasure. Like its predecessors, it is full of kind, healthy feeling and fine observation of nature, with occasional touches of quaint and delicate humour."—Lon. Athen., 1837, p. 570.

17. Recollections of a Literary Life; or, Books, Places, and People, 1852, 3 vols. cr. 8vo; 2d ed., 1853, 2 vols. p. 8vo; 3d ed., 1857, 2 vols. Criticised with much severity, though not without qualifications, in the Irish Quarterly Review, March, 1852, vol. ii. 123–141. Noticed more favourably in the Lon. Athenæum, 1852, 10–11. Both of these periodicals justly object to the title not being a correct index to the character of the volumes. 18. Atherton, and other Tales, 1854, 3 vols. 8vo. Atherton occupies one of the three vols.; the other two contain reprints of fugitive stories,—Marion Campbell, &c.

"'Atherton' is a charming tale, and refreshes the reader like a drive in the country. It is written in a cheerful, kindly, buoyant spirit, and leaves but one thing to be desired,—that it had been longer and the plot more worked out."—Lon. Athen., 1854, 463.

"'Atherton' is, if possible, more in the spirit of 'Our Village' than any thing besides that Miss Mitford has written. . . . This is the charm of 'Atherton;' and for this it will go down to posterity as a truthful picture of rural England in our own time."—Lon. Critic.

"Full of Miss Mitford's peculiar genius, and sure of delighting everybody."—Lon. Examiner.

"One of the most delightful books that have appeared for a long time."—Lon. Spectator.

"The great and abiding charms of 'Atherton' are the simplicity and beauty everywhere abundant throughout the narrative."—Illustrated Lon. News.

"We claim for 'Atherton' more popularity even than for Miss Mitford's former works. Mary Russell Mitford is associated with the scenery and all the rural virtues that ever did or ever can adorn our happy country."—Lon. Art Jour.

18. Dramatic Works, 1854, 2 vols. p. 8vo. Contents: vol. i., Julian, The Foscari, Rienzi, and Charles the First, —all Tragedies: see Nos. 8, 9, 11, and 12, ante. Vol. ii., Sadak and Kalasrade, in two acts; Mer de Castro, in five acts; Gastron de Blondeville, in three acts; Otto of Wittelsbach, in five acts; and eleven shorter pieces, entitled Dramatic Scenes, previously pub. in the London Magazine and in various Annuals. No small part of the value of these volumes—which have been highly commended—consists in the autobiographical introductions, to which we refer the reader.

"In the annals of modern literature there are few collections of plays by a woman, including tragedies in verse, which have succeeded on the English stage. Here, however, is an instance. In her ripeness of age, Miss Mitford has collected into one chaplet the laurels gathered in her prime of authorship; and she has given it to the world with a graceful and loving letter of reminiscence and benediction. We read these words with the tenderness of an old friendship. . . . It will be seen by our extracts that Miss Mitford gossips lightly and gracefully about her early successes and failures, her friends and foes. . . . Laid by the side of the volume of 'Dramatic Works of Joanna Baillie,' these volumes suffer no disparagement. This is high praise; and it is well deserved. The books which we thus venture to place together might appeal to the judgments of literary Europe, and we should have no fear of Britomart or Bloomer producing any thing which could make a competent jury uncrown either of the two kindred—yet distinct—female tragic poets of England."—Lon. Athen., 1854, 931–933.

In addition to the literary labours now noticed, Miss Mitford contributed four stories to Mrs. Johnstone's Edinburgh Tales, 1845,—viz.: I. The Freshwater Fisherman; II. Country-Town Life; III. Christmas Amusements, Stories, and Characters; IV. Old Master Green;—and she edited four of the annual volumes of Finden's Tableaux.

In 1838,—to the great credit of those in power,—Miss Mitford's name was added to the pension-list. We noticed an announcement, some time since, that it was in contemplation to publish a selection from her correspondence, from the numerous papers in the hands of her executor, the Rev. W. Harness. Should this project be carried out—and it ought to be carried out—we hope that application will be made to our friend Mr. James T. Fields, of Boston, (see p. 595 of this Dictionary,) for some of the many letters of friendship and literary memoranda addressed to him by Miss Mitford. We have quoted many critical opinions on the characteristics of this excellent writer; but there are a number before us still unnoticed.

"Miss Mitford's books are, in their way, the most charming companions by the fireside or in the woods and fields that have yet appeared in our literature."—PROFESSOR WILSON.

"Scott," remarks Lord Byron, "found peculiar favour and imitation among the fair sex: there was Miss Holford, and Miss Mitford, and Miss Francis; but—with the greatest respect be it spoken—none of his imitators did much honour to the original except Hogg, the Ettrick Shepherd," &c.—Moore's Life of Byron, vol. ii., Letter CCCXCV.

"Her first claims on the public were no doubt as a poetess, in her early 'Sketches,' and in her 'Christina, the Maid of the South Seas,' a six-canto production of the Sir Walter Scott school, of considerable merit: but she is chiefly to be remembered as the author of 'Our Village,' so full of truth, and raciness, and fine English life; and for her three tragedies, 'Julian,' 'The Vespers of Palermo,' and 'Rienzi,' the last of which was, I believe, eminently successful in representation. Her latter verses are all able and elegant; but she is deficient in that nameless adaptation of expression to thought accomplished by some indescribable, some inexpressible collocation of the best words in their best places, apparently quite necessary for the success of poetical phrase. This power, on the contrary, Mary Howitt possesses in perfection; while she is somewhat wanting in the essential matter—the more solid materials—which Miss Mitford seems to have ever at command. The one is mightiest in facts, the other in fancy."—Moir's Sketches of the Poet. Lit. of the Past Half-Century, 1851, 271–272.

"TO MARY RUSSELL MITFORD.

[" These beautiful lines were addressed to the author of Our Village a few months before she died.]

"The hay is carried; and the Hours
Snatch, as they pass, the linden flowers;
And children leap to pluck a spray
Bent earthward, and then run away.
Park-keeper, catch me those grave thieves,
About whose frocks the fragrant leaves,
Sticking and fluttering here and there,
No false nor faltering witness bear.
I never view such scenes as these
In grassy meadow girt with trees,
But comes a thought of her who now
Sits with serenely patient brow
Amid deep sufferings. None hath told
More pleasant tales to young and old.
Fondest was she of Father Thames,
But rambled to Hellenic streams;

Nor even there could any tell
The country's purer charms so well
As Mary Mitford.
Verse! go forth
And breathe o'er gentle breasts her worth.
Needless the task; . . . but, should she see
One hearty wish from you and me,
A moment's pain it may assuage,—
A rose-leaf on the couch of Age."
WALTER SAVAGE LANDOR.

Mitford, William, M.P., 1744–1827, the eldest son of John Mitford, and the brother of Lord Redesdale, (ante,) was a native of London, and studied at Queen's College, Oxford, and subsequently in the Middle Temple. In 1761, on succeeding by the death of his father to the family estate, he forsook law for letters, and especially devoted himself to the cultivation of Greek literature, for which he had displayed an early predilection. In 1769, he became a captain in the South Hampshire Militia, of which Gibbon was then major; (see GIBBON, EDWARD, p. 661 of this Dictionary;) in 1776, he visited the Continent; on his return home became a county magistrate, and, in 1778, was appointed Verderer of the New Forest, (on the borders of which he resided;) succeeded Gibbon as Lieutenant-Colonel of the South Hampshire Militia in 1779, was appointed colonel in 1805, and resigned in 1806; sat in the House of Commons as a member for Newport, Cornwall, 1785–90; represented Beeralston, 1796–1806, and from 1812 to '18 was member for New Romney. 1. An Inquiry into the Principles of Harmony in Languages, and of the Mechanism of Verse, Modern and Ancient, 1774, 8vo; 2d ed., 1804, 8vo.

"We think that he who proposes schemes for improving the euphony of the English language would be heard with more deference if he were studious of writing that language, as it now exists, with propriety and elegance. The work has, however, intrinsic merit, which will compensate the faults of style; and we think it our duty to recommend it to the attention of all who take any interest in such speculations."—Edin. Rev., vi. 357–386. (Review of 2d ed.)

"Talked of Mitford's 'Harmony of Languages,' praised by Lord L[ansdowne]. . . . Lord Lansdowne said . . . the best remarks on the use of these words ["will" and "shall"] he had ever seen were in Mitford's 'Harmony of Languages.' "—Thomas Moore's Memoirs, &c., ii. 155, 346, 1853.

Mitford's History closes with the death of Alexander the Great: he had intended to continue it to the subjugation of Greece by the Romans. There is an edit.—1835, 8 vols. 12mo—"continued by Davenport;" but this is merely a republication of the earliest, and, of course, unrevised, edition of the first two vols. of the quarto edit.; and the remainder of the work, which has necessarily been substituted for the 3d, 4th, and 5th vols.,

"bears no more resemblance to the classical composition of Mr. Mitford than Turner and Simpson's Histories of England bear to that of Hume."—Lon. Courier.

The only edit. which the student must look at is that printed by Cadell, (7th and last,) with Lord Redesdale's Notes on the Text and Memoir of the Author, and Wm. King's revisions of the References, Quotations, and Chronology, (amended by Clinton's Fasti Hellenici,—corrections in the shape of notes,) 1838, 8 vols. 8vo: fine wove paper, hot-pressed, £4 4*s.*; or in 10 vols. 12mo, £2.

Mitford's History of Greece has already come under our notice in our comments on the histories of the same country by Dr. John Gillies and Mr. Grote, (see pp. 672, 747 of this Dictionary;) but it is too important a work to be dismissed without a more careful consideration. To imagine that the faults of style, errors of statements, and partisanship in politics which are alleged against Mitford are sufficient reasons for his entire banishment from the library is to imagine a great absurdity. Doubtless Mitford was superseded as an authority by Thirlwall; and both Mitford and Thirlwall have been superseded by Grote. Supersede means, to occupy a higher seat, not to exclude from the premises. If Mr. Grote will "brook no brother near the throne," he will as little quarrel with those who have no disposition to dispute his supremacy. But we hasten to the citation of critical opinions on Mr. Mitford's History:

"His great pleasure consists in praising tyrants, abusing Plutarch, spelling oddly, and writing quaintly; and—what is strange, after all—his is the best modern history of Greece in any language, and he is perhaps the best of all modern historians whatsoever. Having named his sins, it is but fair to state his virtues,—learning, labour, research, wrath, and partiality. I call the latter virtues in a writer, because they make him write in earnest."—LORD BYRON.

His lordship's concluding observation reminds us of the comment of an esteemed historian, recently deceased, who brought his profound scholarship to bear upon the illustration of the annals of the haughty conquerors of Greece:

"This, I think, is the merit of Mitford; and it is a great one. His very anti-Jacobin partialities, much as they have interfered with the fairness of his history, have yet completely saved it from being dull. He took an interest in the parties of Greece because he was alive to the parties of his own time. He described the popular party in Athens just as he would have described the Whigs of England. He was unjust to Demosthenes because he would have been unjust to Mr. Fox."—DR. ARNOLD.

"Looked into Mitford's History of Greece. The Athenian Democracy imparts no sort of relish for that sort of government, and justifies Aristotle in saying, 'Η Δημοκρατια ἡ τελευταία Τυραννὶς ἐστι,—and of the worst sort, we may add. The account of the expedition and retreat of the Ten Thousand is above measure interesting. How much more than men do the Greeks appear compared with the effeminate and pusillanimous Persians! One can hardly believe them of the same species!"—Green's Diary of a Lover of Lit., Oct. 30th. 1798. Ipswich, 1810, 4to, 113.

"Mr. Mitford is the first who brought to the arduous task of Grecian history the extensive research, accurate inquiry, and profound reflection which characterize the scholars of recent times. . . . His great work was chiefly composed during, or shortly after, the French Revolution; and it was mainly intended to counteract the visionary ideas in regard to the blessings of Grecian democracy which had spread so far in the world from the magic of Athenian genius. . . . The cause of truth has been essentially aided by his exertions; and the experiences of the workings of democracy in our own times have been such as to forbid a doubt as to the accuracy of the facts he has stated, whatever hesitation may be felt as to the wisdom of the expressions in which they are sometimes conveyed. . . . It may appear strange to say that there is equal truth in the monarchical history of Greece by Mitford and in the republican by Grote; but, nevertheless, it is so. Both tell the truth, and nothing but the truth, but neither the whole truth."—SIR ARCHIBALD ALISON: Hist. of Europe, 1815–1852, chap. v.

"The admirable historian of ancient Greece,—clarum et venerabile nomen."—Blackw. Mag., xv. 73, Jan. 1824.

"There are very few works which do more honour to the literature of the present time than Mr. Mitford's History of Greece. . . . . Mr. Mitford has indeed conferred a very eminent service upon his country by writing a History of Greece in the true English spirit. . . . Assuredly he is one of the most philosophical of historians. . . . His book we think one of those which no man who reads it once will be satisfied without reading over and over again; we think, on the contrary, it is formed to be one of the most stable companions of a reflective man's solitude."—Ibid., v. 443–451, July, 1819.

"This great work is distinguished for its accuracy, freedom, and its trustworthiness. He does not scruple to tell the truth, and the whole truth, and to paint the stormy democracies of Greece in all their grandeur and in all their wretchedness."—CHANCELLOR KENT: Course of Eng. Reading, Oakley's ed., 1853, 4.

"Considered with respect not only to the whole series of antient events which it comprises, but also to any very prominent portion of that series, Mr. Mitford's history is the best that has appeared since the days of Xenophon. By calling it the best, we mean that it is the strongest in that quality which is the cardinal virtue, or rather the four cardinal virtues in one, of historic composition,—trustworthiness. Such praise, it will instantly occur to the reader, is seldom bestowed where it is best due without a credit-account of censure being opened at the same time; and, in fact, it is our purpose to conform to this general practice. The work before us, indeed, is one which bears to be commended with discrimination, and its excellences, if faithfully displayed, may sustain such a contrast of shadow as would perfectly extinguish the farthing brightness of those novels founded on fact commonly called histories. . . . Upon the whole, though we think it rather unfortunate that the story of the Grecian republics should have been told by one who has so many anti-republican partialities, we think it our duty to testify that it has been more justly told by Mr. Mitford than by any preceding author, and that those who differ from him in his political conclusions must still acknowledge their obligations to the clearness and fulness of his narrative."—LORD BROUGHAM: Edin. Rev., xii. 478–517, July, 1808. (Review of vol. iv. 4to, pub. 1808.)

"Mr. Mitford, the last in time, is certainly not the least in merit, amongst the modern compilers of Grecian annals. He has brought to his task acuteness and patient investigation, and by the aid of these valuable qualities he has generally been successful in unravelling the intricate web of Grecian politics; yet in the higher faculties and accomplishments of an historian, and particularly an historian of Greece, he is, we lament to say, singularly deficient. . . . Of the style which Mr. Mitford has adopted in his work it is scarcely possible to speak in terms of too severe reprobation. It is obscure, inharmonious, and ungrammatical. It is obscure, not from negligence, but by system; and inharmonious, not by chance, but upon principle. . . . These passages (and such are found in almost every page) outrage, it will be seen, not only harmony, but even the most common principles of composition. They are absolutely a disgrace to a person of such talents and acquirements as the author of the work before us. . . . Mr. Mitford has applied to this (as well as to his preceding volumes) the title of the History of Greece: he should have denominated it a Narrative of Alexander's Conquests in Asia; for very little is said of the country whose name it bears."—Lon. Quar. Rev., xxv. 154–174, April, 1821. (Review of vol. v., 4to, pub. 1818.)

"Though we cannot pretend to the possession of any great share of democratical prejudice, we must acknowledge that both in perusing the pages of Mr. Mitford and those of M. Clavier we have been much fatigued by the perpetual recurrence of a defensive or a laudatory tone whenever a tyrant happened to appear on the ground. Both these authors, it is true, are too conscientious and too accurate materially to warp facts; but it is not less true that a strong predisposition will inevitably infect the mode of viewing an object even where the intentions are the most honest."—Lon. Quar. Rev., v. 33, (see also 35–37,) Feb. 1811: Clavier's Histoire des Premiers Temps de la Grèce.

"Mitford appears to be the great master of political wisdom whom Mr. Mitchell has chosen to follow; and our readers must be pretty generally aware of what respect is due to the prejudices of an historian who makes heroes of the cold-blooded Darius, the cruel Xerxes, and almost of the frantic Cambyses, while he can bestow an elaborate frigidity upon his account of Marathon and toil to deepen every stain upon the patriotic virtues of Demosthenes. We say this without meaning in the least to detract from the praises he deserves for the great care and attention he has employed in the compilation of his history; but the student will be bitterly disappointed who expects to find it rich either in impartial views or liberal opinions."—Edin. Rev., xxxiv. 312, Nov. 1820: Mitchell's Aristophanes.

"Indeed, whenever this historian mentions Demosthenes, he violates all the laws of candour and even of decency: he weighs no authorities, he makes no allowances, he forgets the best-authenticated facts in the history of the times and the most generally-recognized principles of human nature. The opposition of the great orator to the policy of Philip he represents as neither more nor less than deliberate villany."—Lord Macaulay: Miscell., Phila. ed., 1848, 430: Mitford's Hist. of Greece.

"The only modern historian of Greece who attempted or even affected criticism on evidences—Mr. Mitford—made almost no other use of it than to find reasons for rejecting all statements discreditable to any despot or usurper. Dr. Thirlwall has effectually destroyed Mitford as an historical authority, by substituting (though so unostentatiously as to give no sufficient idea of the service rendered) a candid and impartial narrative for the most prejudiced misrepresentation by which party passion has been known to pervert the history of a distant time and a foreign people."—Edin. Rev., lxxxiv. 345, Oct. 1846: Grote's Hist. of Greece, vols. i., ii.

"He contracts the strongest individual partialities; and, according as these lead, he is credulous or mistrustful, he exaggerates or he qualifies, he expands or he cuts down the documents on which he has to proceed. With regard to the bright side of almost every king whom he has to describe, Mr. Mitford is more than credulous; for a credulous man believes all he is told: Mr. Mitford believes more than he is told. With regard to the dark side of the same individuals, his habits of estimating evidence are precisely in the opposite extreme. In treating of the democracies or of the democratical leaders, his statements are not less partial and exaggerated."—Westm. Rev., 1826.

"Talked [with Lord Lansdowne] of Mitford's 'History,'—the bad taste of carrying back the virulence of modern politics into a history of the Grecian republic."—Thomas Moore's Memoirs, &c., ii. 155, 1853.

"We could not convey a better notion of the difference between an universal and a partial knowledge of ancient learning than by directing the attention of the reader to Niebuhr and to Mitford. Mitford had studied most carefully the original authorities for Grecian history; and to this research he owes his very great superiority to the crowd of his predecessors,—repeaters of repetitions and compilers of compilations. Probably no person was ever better acquainted with Thucydides or Xenophon or Arian, so far as those writers can be interpreted out of themselves. But his knowledge of Greek literature beyond the range of the professed historians was very meagre."—Edin. Rev., lvi. 272, Jan. 1833: Niebuhr's Roman Hist.

"For Harmodius and Aristogeiton (note on v. 889) we expected no quarter; and, rejoicing in the editor's eulogy of the 'fine poetry' lavished on their names, we regret only that as to other matters he [Mr. Mitchell] depends on an authority so inferior to his own as that of Mr. Mitford."—Edin. Rev., lxi. 329, July, 1835: Mitchell's Acharnenses.

"The principal characteristic of this historian—the origin of his excellencies and his defects—is a love of singularity. He has no notion of going with a multitude to do either good or evil. An exploded opinion or an unpopular person has an irresistible charm for him. The same perverseness may be traced in his diction. His style would never have been elegant, but it might at least have been manly and perspicuous; and nothing but the most elaborate care could possibly have made it so bad as it is. It is distinguished by harsh phrases, strange collocations, occasional solecisms, frequent obscurity, and, above all, by a peculiar oddity which can no more be described than it can be overlooked. Nor is this all. Mr. Mitford piques himself on spelling better than any of his neighbours, and this not only in ancient names,—which he mangles in defiance both of custom and reason,—but in the most ordinary words of the English language."—Lord Macaulay: Mitford's History of Greece: Miscellanies, Phila. ed., 1848, 424–432.

And see pp. 63–64,—History, (also in Edin. Rev., xlvii. 360–361, May, 1828.)

"History cannot fall within a survey of elegant literature except so far as relates to its rhetorical execution. In this particular, some writers of the age—as Mitford and Turner, for example—have been so abominably perverse that it would seem as if they were willing to try what degree of bad writing the public would tolerate for the sake of the valuable matter it may contain."—William H. Moir, David Macbeth, M.D., 1798–1851, a native of Musselburgh, Scotland, studied medicine at the University of Edinburgh, obtained a surgeon's diploma when eighteen years of age, and for the rest of his life practised physic during the day and wrote prose and poetry at night. He was a man of great excellence of character, and refused to remove to Edinburgh, where professional advancement was awaiting him, from unwillingness to leave the many poor patients who had long depended on his ministrations.

"His, indeed, was a life far more devoted to the service of others than to his own personal aggrandisement,—a life whose value can only be appreciated now, when he has been called to receive his reward in that better world, the passport to which he sought so diligently—in youth as in manhood, in happiness as in sorrow—to obtain.

"Bright as the flowers may be which are twined for the coronal of the poet, they have no glory when placed beside the wreath which belongs to the departed Christian. We have represented Delta as he was,—as he must remain ever in the affectionate memory of his friends; and with this brief and unequal tribute to his surpassing worth we take farewell of the gentlest and kindest being, of the most true and single hearted man, whom we may ever hope to meet with in the course of this earthly pilgrimage."—Blackw. Mag., lxx. 249–250: The late D. M. Moir, q. v.

To the excellent periodical from which we have just quoted, Moir (Δ) commenced contributing, it is supposed, as early as 1817, (the year in which it was established;) and his last paper—the Lament of Selim—appeared in the magazine for July, 1851. A list of his contributions to Blackwood, amounting to nearly four hundred in number, will be found in the general Index to Blackwood's Edinburgh Magazine, vols. i.–l. p. 128, Delta, (D. M. Moir.) Before the establishment of Blackwood he made Constable's Edinburgh Magazine and the Scots Magazine his vehicle of communication with the public. Many of his fugitive pieces were subsequently pub. in volumes. 1. The Bombardment of Algiers, and other Poems, Edin. 2. The Legend of Genevieve, with other Tales and Poems, 1824, 8vo.

"He has produced many original pieces which will possess a permanent place in the poetry of Scotland. Delicacy and grace characterise his happiest compositions: some of them are beautiful in a cheerful spirit that has only to look on nature to be happy, and others breathe the simplest and purest pathos. His scenery, whether sea-coast or inland, is always truly Scottish; and at times his pen drops touches of light on minute objects that till then had slumbered in the shade, but now 'shine well where they stand' or lie, as component and characteristic parts of our lowland landscape."—PROF. WILSON: Recreations of Christopher North: and in Blackw. Mag., xxxi. 984.

3. The Life of Mansie Wauch, Tailor in Dalkeith: Written by Himself, 1828, 12mo, pp. 374. This was commenced in Blackwood's Mag. in 1824, and pub. there serially for nearly three years. It was generally attributed to Moir's friend John Galt,—for whom, by-the-by, Moir wrote the concluding chapters of The Last of the Lairds, left unfinished on Galt's departure to America. Mansie Wauch was so popular that eight edits. (the last, 1849, fp. 8vo) were pub. in Great Britain; and it was reprinted in America and France.

"A most amusing volume,—embodying that quaint, quiet humour which seems to belong to Old Scotia, in all its national peculiarity, very happily, and a scene or two of more sombre cast, touching to a degree."—Lon. Lit. Gaz., 1828, 243.

"Of all the productions of the season in the class of works of the imagination, scarcely excepting 'The Chronicles of the Canongate,' none equals the genuine humour, the simple truth, the freshness and life of the autobiography of Mansie Wauch, Tailor in Dalkeith."—Lon. Spectator.

"Burns has almost completely missed those many peculiar features of the national character and manners which are brought out so inimitably in Mansie Wauch. Mansie himself is a perfect portraiture; and how admirably in keeping with the central autobiographer are the characters and scenes which revolve around his needle!"—THOMAS AIRD: Memoir of Moir.

"There [in Blackwood's Magazine] 'Delta' flooded the land with many thousand lines of unreadable 'poetry,' and showed, by his 'Autobiography of Mansie Wauch, Tailor at Dalkeith,' that not in sentiment but in humour was his real strength, in which, had he pleased, he might have surpassed Galt himself."—DR. R. S. MACKENZIE: Hist. of Blackw. Mag., pref. to his ed. of Noctes Ambros., 1855, i., xv.

Dr. Mackenzie, it will be observed, does not estimate Moir's poetical abilities at a very high rate: he remarks on another occasion that to Blackwood's Magazine

"he contributed some 395 poems, about six of which are very good. His line was homely humour, as displayed in his autobiography of Mansie Wauch, Tailor; but he wrote only one volume of that sort."—Noctes Ambros., ii. 21, n.

4. Outlines of the Ancient History of Medicine; being a View of the Healing Art among the Egyptians, Greeks, Romans, and Arabians, 1831, 12mo; 1834, 12mo. Moir contemplated the preparation of two more parts as a continuation to this work, bringing the History of Medicine down to the middle of the eighteenth century.

"This is a book of great and laborious research, and will be in the hands of every disciple of medicine, and, indeed, of every scholar, who wishes to trace up the history of the healing art to the earliest times. It will be valued as long as medicine is cultivated in this country; and the student would do well to master its contents among his initiatory steps in acquiring professional knowledge. Mr. Moir has laid the profession of medicine under deep obligations to him for this valuable present."—THOMAS CAMPBELL.

5. Practical Observations on Malignant Cholera, 1832, pamphlet. 6. Proofs of the Contagion of Malignant Cholera, 1832. Both of these treatises were highly commended. 7. "I cannot resist the impulse of thanking you with all my heart for the deep gratification you have afforded me, and the soothing, and, I hope, bettering, emotions which you have excited. I am sure that what you have written is more genuine pathos than any thing almost I have ever read in verse, and is so tender and true, so sweet and natural, as to make all lower recommendations indifferent."—LORD JEFFREY.

8. Sketches of the Poetical Literature of the Past Half-Century, 1851, 12mo; Posth., 2d ed., 1852. These six excellent Lectures, from which we have often quoted in this Dictionary, were delivered before the Edinburgh Philosophical Institution for the session 1850–51.

"His general enthusiasm seldom or never blinds his discriminating eyesight. And throughout all this volume he has praised very few indeed who have not, in some field or another of poetry, eminently distinguished themselves. We mention again the wide knowledge of the poetry of the period which his lectures display. This bursts out, as it were, at every pore of his book. . . . He goes to criticise, too, in the spirit of a poet. . . . But, instead of dwelling on Delta's faults, or quoting any of the eloquent and beautiful passages in which his lectures abound, we close by calling on our readers to peruse for themselves. His book is not only worthy of his reputation, but is really one of the heartiest, sincerest, and most delightful works of criticism we have read for many a long year."—GEORGE GILFILLAN: Third Gall. of Literary Portraits, N. "The subject is well worthy of all the energies of criticism: the most learned, candid, and exalted. We cannot bring ourselves to think that Mr. Moir has done with it all that might be done, but he has accomplished that which a gifted man might be proud to have attempted. Moir edited for Blackwood Mrs. Hemans's Poems, (7 vols., and subsequently in 1 vol.,) contributed to Fraser's Magazine, to the Edinburgh Literary Gazette from 1829 to '32, wrote (in 1845) the notice of Inveresk Parish in the New Statistical Account of Scotland, and edited the poems and wrote the life of his friend Robert Macnish, M.D., LL.D.: see p. 1194 of this Dictionary. More than twenty years before Moir's death, Macnish had thus sketched his friend's lineaments:

"On every gentle scene
That moves the human breast,
Pathetic and serene,
Thine eye delights to rest."

"DELTA. . . . 'My name in literature I know is humble; but, such as my reputation is, I am satisfied with it. My ambition lies elsewhere: it is in my profession.'

NORTH. 'Your name in literature is not humble: it is high; and all who have heads to know and hearts to feel what true poetry is acknowledge Mr. Moir to be a poet. It is a delightful thought to me, sir, to think that your fine native genius offered almost its first-fruits to the work which I occasionally overlook and in which I now take an almost fatherly interest. It is now enriched with many gems of your ripened and matured imagination; and no Number can ever be unworthy of the name of Maga that is graced with the signature of Delta.'"—Noctes Ambros., July, 1830.

A monument was erected to Moir at Musselburgh in 1854,—a statue eight and a half feet high, upon a pedestal of twenty feet. At the base is the following:

"In memory of David Macbeth Moir. Beloved as a man, honoured as a citizen, esteemed as a physician, and celebrated as a poet. Born 5th January, 1798; died 6th July, 1851."

Moll, Herman, d. 1732, pub. several works on geography, &c. and a number of maps. Among these are his Descrip. of England and Wales, 1724, fol., and his Atlas of Asia Minor, s. a., sm. 4to, containing sixty-two col'd maps, which every collector of early American books must possess.

"The number of the maps of America, Darien, and the West India Islands, in this old Atlas, is eighteen. These have a short account of the discovery, &c. of each place engraved on it. In that of Newfoundland, the limits of the French fishing-ground are pointed out. Moll appears to have bestowed unusual care on these American maps. In his preface he says, 'The curious will find many valuable pieces, particularly in America, which are new and were never engraved before. I laid them down from original drafts, communicated to me by persons of knowledge.'"

See also Rich's Bibl. Amer. Nova, i. 14, 19. Moll's Atlas of 54 col'd maps was pub. by Bowles in 1736.

This Atlas has now become very scarce and valuable, it having the views of the principal cities of Great Britain and the world in general finely engraved, and showing their condition more than a century past.

Sir William Moncreiff, was ordained a minister of the Church of Scotland, 1771, was for some time his father's successor as minister of Blachford, and from 1775 until his death officiated as minister of St. Cuthbert's, Edinburgh. He was a popular preacher, and succeeded Dr. John Erskine in "the chieftainship of the Whig party of the Kirk of Scotland." 1. Serm., Prov. xiii. 22, Edin., 1792, 8vo. 2. Serms., (XIII.,) 1805, 8vo; 2d. ed., 1807, 8vo.

"The sermons of Sir H. Moncreiff are evidently the productions of a sensible and serious man, who trusts more to the weight and importance of his matter than to the manner in which it may be set off and adorned. He is always instructive, commonly forcible, and his language has at least the merit of perspicuity."—Edin. Rev., vi. 105–112.

"We have endeavoured to do justice to the learned and pious author by such extracts from his work as our limits would allow us to insert. They are but few of very many that we could have selected; and we have no hesitation in saying that by far the greater part of the book, if not the whole, will be found equal to the specimens here presented to the reader."—*Brit. Montacutius, anglicè Montagu.

Montagu, Basil, 1770–1851, Queen's Counsel, a Commissioner of Bankruptcy, 1806–07, and for ten years Accountant-General in Bankruptcy, was the son of John Montagu, fourth Earl of Sandwich, and Miss Ray, who was shot in 1779 in the piazza of Covent-Garden Theatre by Mr. Hackman. See Croft, Sir Herbert. Montagu entered the University of Cambridge in 1786, was called to the Bar at Gray's Inn in 1798, subsequently became a member of Lincoln's Inn, and was noted for his intimate knowledge of the bankrupt-laws. He pub. altogether about 40 volumes, principally compilations, and left nearly 100 vols. of MSS. Of his Law Reports, several eds. were pub. in conjunction with Scrope Ayrton, R. Bligh, E. Chitty, Edward Deacon, John De Jex, J. MacArthur, and I. Neale: see Marvin's Leg. Bibl., 523. Among the most important of his publications are: 1. A Summary of the Law of Set-Off, Lon., 1801, 8vo; 2d ed., 1828, 8vo; 2d Amer. ed., Phila., 1825, 8vo. This work was noticed with approbation by Sir Vicary Gibbs; but, on the other hand, it has been pronounced "singularly brief and unsatisfactory." See 5 Mason, 207; Pref. to Barbour on Set-Off. 2. A Digest of the Bankrupt-Laws, Lon., 1805, 4 vols. 8vo; 3d ed., with F. Gregg, 1827, 2 vols. 8vo. 3. Selections from Taylor, Hooker, Hall, Lord Bacon, &c., 1805, 12mo; 5th ed., 1839, fp. 8vo. 4. The Opinions of Different Authors on the Punishment of Death, 1809–16, 3 vols. 8vo. See H. G. Bohn's Catalogue, 1841, No. 4659, for a list of four more vols. (by different authors) on this subject, edited by B. Montagu. Mr. Montagu and his coadjutors were successful in their efforts on this behalf. 5. Inquiries into the Effects of Fermented Liquors, by a Water-Drinker, 1814, 8vo. 6. With Scrope Ayrton, Law and Practice in Bankruptcy; 2d ed., by J. Herbert Koe and Samuel Miller, 1844, 2 vols. 8vo. An excellent work. See 13 Leg. Obs., 484; 13 Law Mag., 533; 3 Kent Com., 514. 7. Law of Partnership; 2d ed., 1822, 2 vols. 8vo; N. York, 1832, 2 vols. 8vo. 8. The Works of Lord Bacon, with a Memoir, Lon., 1825–34, 17 vols. 8vo. The most complete edition extant: it contains translations as well as the original of the Latin Works, and is illustrated by Portraits, Views, and Fac-Similes, with a New Life of Lord Bacon by the editor. Already noticed in our life of Lord Bacon, pp. 89–90, ante. See also Lord Macaulay's Crit. and Histor. Essays, 1854, Index; Hallam's Lit. Hist. of Europe, 4th ed., 1854, Index; Edin. Rev., Oct. 1857; SPEDDING, JAMES, (post.) As we have not hesitated to express our dissent from some of Mr. Montagu's conclusions, (v. p. 89, ante,) it is only fair to quote on his behalf the approval of a much more distinguished critic than we claim to be:

"A learned and valuable work upon the Life of Lord Bacon is prepared for publication by Mr. B. Montagu, in which some very important facts are proved satisfactorily by the ingenious author, and show how much the criminality of this great man is exaggerated in the common accounts of his fall. But it is clearly shown that he was prevailed upon by the intrigues of James I. and his profligate minister to abandon his own defence and sacrifice himself to their base and crooked policy; a defence which disgraces them more than it vindicates him. One thing, however, is undeniable: that they who so loudly blame Bacon overlook the meanness of almost all the great statesmen of those courtly times." —Lord Brougham's Discourse of Natural Theology.

9. Essays and Selections, 1837, 12mo. 10. Lord Bacon's Essays, 1838, r. 8vo; 1845, fp. 8vo. On vellum, 2 copies only printed, £7. 11. In conjunction with W. Johnson Neale, Law of Parliamentary Elections, 1841, 12mo. See Lon. Gent. Mag., 1852, Pt. 1, 410–413; Southey's Life and Corresp., chap. vi. Mr. Montagu's memory is to be respected as that of a zealous promoter of temperance and legal reform, and a man of uncommon sagacity. The work by a Water-Drinker (No. 5, supra) was trans. into French and German, and did much good at home; and he lived to see the punishment of hanging abolished for comparatively minor offences. In this effort, it will be remembered, he was greatly aided by Sir Samuel Romilly, Sir James Mackintosh, Lord Nugent, Wilberforce, and others. Lord Brougham was wont to say that Montagu was "always many years in advance of the time."

Montagu, or Montague, Charles, Earl of Halifax, 1661–1715, fourth son of the Hon. George Montagu, first brought himself into notice by his verses on the death of King Charles the Second in 1685; and in 1687 he extended his reputation by his partnership with Prior in the Country Mouse and the City Mouse, a burlesque of Dryden's Hind and Panther. When Prior learned that King William had granted Montagu a pension of £500 per annum until an appointment could be found for him, he exclaimed,

"My friend Charles Montague's preferred;
Nor could I have it long observed
That one mouse eats, whiles t'other's starved.

Having entered the House of Commons, he rapidly made his way to political distinction: in 1691 he was made a Commissioner of the Treasury, and was sworn of the Privy Council; in 1694 he was nominated Chancellor of the Exchequer, and Under-Treasurer; in 1698 he was made First Commissioner of the Treasury, and appointed one of the Lords-Justices in the king's absence; in 1699 he became Auditor of the Exchequer, and in 1700 was called to the House of Peers, by the style of Baron Halifax. After falling into discredit with the House of Commons during the latter years of William and in the reign of Queen Anne, he was by George I. advanced to the earldom of Halifax, with the Order of the Garter, and was reinstated in his post of First Commissioner of the Treasury. He was esteemed a patron of poets, and his merits were of course duly celebrated by the objects of his regard. Addison urges his wearied pen to another effort when about concluding his Account of the Greatest English Poets:

"I'm tired with rhyming, and would fain give o'er;
But justice still demands one labour more.
The noble Montague remains unnamed,
For wit, for humour, and for judgment famed;
To Dorset he directs his artful muse,
In numbers such as Dorset's self might use.
How negligently graceful he unveins
His verse, and writes in loose, familiar strains!
How Nassau's godlike acts adorn his lines,
And all the hero in full glory shines!
We see his army set in just array,
And Boyne's dyed waves run purple to the sea.
Nor Simois, choked with men and arms and blood,
Nor rapid Xanthus' celebrated flood,
Shall longer be the poet's highest themes,
Though gods and heroes fought promiscuous in their streams.
But now, to Nassau's secret councils raised,
He aids the hero whom before he praised."

This rather extravagant laudation, it must be remembered in justice to the poet, was written as early as 1694.

In addition to the portion of the satire just noticed, his lordship wrote a number of minor poems and some political tracts. Miscellaneous Works, Lon., 1704, 8vo; Life and Miscellaneous Works, 1715, 8vo; Poetical Works, 1716, 8vo. His poems are reprinted in vol. ix. of Johnson's and Chalmers's English Poets.

"Many a blandishment was practised upon Halifax which he would never have known had he no other attractions than those of his poetry, of which a short time has withered the beauties. It would now be esteemed no honour, by a contributor of the monthly bundle of verses, to be told that, in strains either familiar or solemn, he sings like Montague."—DR. JOHNSON: Lives of the Poets, Cunningham's ed., 1854, ii. 81–86. See also iii. 38, 39, 40.

"Considered as a poet, his lordship makes a less considerable figure than the Earl of Dorset: there is a languor in his verses which seems to indicate that he was not born with a poetical genius."—Cibber's Lives.

See also Biog. Brit.; Addison's Works; Swift's Works; Pope's Works; Park's Walpole's R. and N. Authors, iv. 58–66; Lord Macaulay's Hist. of Eng., vols. i., iv., Index.

We have alluded to the compliments which were profusely lavished upon this noble poet. The following, by the Muse of Twickenham, is not one of them:

"Proud as Apollo on his forked hill,
Sat full-blown Bufo, puff'd by every quill;
Fed with soft dedication all day long,
Horace and he went hand-in-hand in song."
Epistle to Dr. Arbuthnot.

This, of course, was written after Pope's quarrel with his lordship. In the Epilogue to his Satires, and the Preface to the Iliad, he speaks in a very different manner of Halifax. Swift intimates that his lordship's patronage was of an inexpensive character:

"Thus Congreve spent in writing plays
And one poor office half his days;
While Montague, who claim'd the station
To be Mecænas of the nation,
For poets open table kept,
But ne'er considered where they slept:
Himself as rich as fifty Jews,
Was easy, though they wanted shoes," &
A Libel on the Rev. Dr. Delany and his Excellency John Lord Carteret, 1729.

"His encouragements," again remarks Swift, "were only good words and good dinners. I never heard him say one good thing or seem to taste what was said by another."—MS. Remarks on the Characters of the Court of Queen Anne: Scott's ed. of Swift's Works, xii. 237.

We all know that neither Pope nor Swift spared any man in a fit of the spleen. Thus much, at least, can be said, to the undying honour of Halifax,—that he was the earliest and best friend, and the efficient patron, of the great Newton, and procured him his appointment in the Mint.

"The Essays of Halifax do great honour to his abilities as a politician and a prose-writer."—HARTLEY COLERIDGE.

"I agree with you, Lord Halifax has no other principle but his ambition; so that he would put all in distraction rather than not gain his point."—Duke of Marlborough to the Duchess of Marlborough, Feb. 7, 1709.

Montagu, Edward Wortley, M.P., 1713–1776, only son of Edward Wortley Montagu and Lady Mary his wife, (post,) was the supposed author of Reflections on the Rise and Fall of Ancient Republics, 1759, 8vo, (also, 1760, '69, '78,) and pub. some papers respecting his travels, and on antiquities, in Phil. Trans., &c. The work on Ancient Republics was claimed by his tutor, the Rev. Mr. Foster, but with what justice is a matter of doubt. The eccentricities of Montagu, who spent much of his time in the East, and alternately employed himself in keeping Mohammedan fasts and breaking Christian commandments, will be found detailed at length in the following volumes: Nichols's Leicestershire; Nichols's Lit. Anec.; L. T. Rede's Anecdotes, 1799; Lady M. W. Montagu's Letters; Mrs. E. Montagu's Letters.

Montagu, Mrs. Elizabeth, 1720–1800, the daughter of Matthew Robinson, Esq., of West Layton, Yorkshire, was married in 1742 to Edward Montagu, Esq., of Denton Hall, grandson of the fifth Earl of Sandwich and cousin to Edward Wortley Montagu, the husband of Lady Mary. By the death of her husband in 1775, she inherited a large fortune, which enabled her to maintain that splendid hospitality by which the leaders of fashion and letters, at home and abroad, were not slow to profit. Of these parties we have graphic accounts by many writers of the day, and perhaps none better than that of the lively Madame D'Arblay:

"While to Mrs. Vesey," this lady remarks, "the Bas Bleu Society owed its origin and its epithet, the meetings that took place at Mrs. Montagu's were soon more popularly known by that denomination; for, though they could not be more fashionable, they were far more splendid.

"Mrs. Montagu had built a superb new house, [Portman Square, London,] which was magnificently fitted up and appeared to be rather appropriate for princes, nobles, and courtiers than for poets, philosophers, and blue-stocking votaries."

And here, in fact, rank and talents were so frequently brought together that what the satirist uttered scoffingly the author pronounced proudly, in setting aside the original claimant to dub Mrs. Montagu Queen of the Blues. In his graphic portrait-gallery of the eminent persons who, on a certain memorable occasion, thronged the great hall of William Rufus, Lord Macaulay remarks,

"There were the members of that brilliant society which quoted, criticized, and exchanged repartees under the rich peacock-hangings of Mrs. Montagu."—Crit. and Histor. Essays, 1854, iii. 180: Warren Hastings.

We shall have occasion presently to stop in again at Portman Square to listen to the brilliant conversation of the accomplished hostess: in the mean time, we must examine her claims to an introduction into our less select columns. 1. Three Dialogues of the Dead; pub. in the 4th ed. of Lord Lyttelton's New Dialogues of the Dead, Lon., 1765, 8vo. See LYTTELTON, LORD GEORGE, No. 6. 2. An Essay on the Writings and Genius of Shakespear, compared with the Greek and French Dramatic Poets; with some remarks upon the Misrepresentations of Mons. de Voltaire, 1769, '70, '72, '85, 1810, 8vo. To this Essay Voltaire immediately responded in a controversial dissertation—Nouvelle Lettre à l'Académie—prefixed to his Irene.

"I no longer wonder that Mrs. Montagu stands at the head of all that is learned, and that every critic veils his bonnet to her superior judgment. The learning, the good sense, the sound judgment, and the wit displayed in it fully justify not only my compliment, but all compliments that either have been already paid to her talents or shall be paid hereafter."—COWPER: Hayley's Life of Cowper.

"The most elegant and judicious piece of criticism which the present age has produced."—Warton's Hist. of Eng. Poetry, ed. 1840, i., xliv.

Mr. Hallam, on the contrary, in referring to some critical essays on Shakspeare, remarks that

"Hurd and Lord Kames, especially the former, may be reckoned among the best of this class; Mrs. Montagu, perhaps, in her celebrated essay, not very far from the bottom of the list."—Lit. Hist. of Europe, 4th ed., 1854, iii. 94.

It is to be remembered that there was a wide interval between the first appearance of Warton's first vol. in 1774 and the date of Mr. Hallam's critique, 1839. Dr. Johnson's early admiration of and late disgust for Mrs. Montagu are as familiar to the literary student as the existence of the same opposing relations, at an earlier period, between Pope and Mrs. Montagu's cousin, Lady Mary. Johnson did not admire the "Essay on Shakespear;" but it is only fair to add that his adverse criticism was expressed before as well as after the author's name was made public. Boswell shall tell his own story.

"Mrs. Montagu, a lady distinguished for having written an Essay on Shakspeare, being mentioned,—

"REYNOLDS. 'I think that Essay does her honour.'

"JOHNSON. 'Yes, sir, it does her honour; but it would do nobody else honour. I have, indeed, not read it all. But when I take up the end of a web and find it packthread, I do not expect by looking further to find embroidery. Sir, I will venture to say there is not one sentence of true criticism in her book.'

"GARRICK. 'But, sir, surely it shows how much Voltaire has mistaken Shakspeare,—which nobody else has done.'

"JOHNSON. 'Sir, nobody else has thought it worth while. And what merit is there in that? You may as well praise a schoolmaster for whipping a boy who has construed ill. No, sir; there is no real criticism in it,—none showing the beauty of thought as formed on the workings of the human heart. . . . Reynolds is fond of her book, and I wonder at it; for neither I, nor Beauclerk, nor Mrs. Thrale [Mrs. Thrale denied this assertion] could get through it.' . . . One day at Sir Joshua's, when it was related that Mrs. Montagu, in an excess of compliment to the author of a modern tragedy [Braganza?], had exclaimed, 'I tremble for Shakspeare,' Johnson said, 'When Shakspeare has got ——— [Jephson?] for his rival and Mrs. Montagu for his defender, he is in a poor state indeed.'" See Croker's Boswell's Life of Johnson, ed. 1848, 205, 347.

On another occasion Johnson said,

"I never did her any serious harm; nor would I,—though I could give her a bite; though she must provoke me much first."

"Mrs. Montagu," said Dr. Beattie, "was very kind to him; but she had more wit than any lady, and Johnson could not bear that any one should be thought to have wit but himself."

3. The Letters of Mrs. Elizabeth Montagu, with some of the Letters of her Correspondents. Part the First: containing her Letters from an early age to the age of Twenty-three, [1731–47.] Published by Matthew Montagu, Esq., M.P., her Nephew and Executor, 1809, 2 vols. 12mo, pp. 630.

"The merit of the pieces before us seems to consist mainly in the great gaiety and vivacity with which they are written. The wit, to-be-sure, is often childish, and generally strained and artificial; but still it both sparkles and abounds; and, though we should admire it more if it were better selected, or even if there were less of it, we cannot witness this profuse display of spirits and ingenuity without receiving a strong impression of the talents and ambition of the writer. The faults of the letters, on the other hand, are more numerous. In the first place, they have, properly speaking, no subjects. They are all letters of mere idleness, friendship, and flattery. There are no events, no reasonings, no anecdotes of persons who are still remembered, no literature, and scarcely any original or serious opinions. . . . There are great faults in the volumes before us; and we do not exactly perceive the necessity of reading the bad letters before we are favoured with the good." LORD JEFFREY: Edin. Rev., xv. 75–87.

"Mrs. Montagu's Letters are lively and ingenious, but not natural."—SIR JAMES MACKINTOSH: Life, vol. i., chap. viii.

4. The Letters of Mrs. Elizabeth Montagu. Part the Second, [1744–61.] Published by Matthew Montagu, Esq., vols. iii., iv.

"Bad taste, of which no doubt she had before her innumerable examples, and the desire of shining continually,—natural enough in a person who had in all probability been told often how much she was fitted to shine,—are the defects that appear in almost every page of her letters. Mrs. Montagu is evidently oppressed by the load of her own superiority. She writes like a person that has a character to support, and whose correspondents would have a right to complain if she ceased one moment to be very wise or witty. . . . But, though we do not think quite so highly of her as Mrs. [Gilbert] West had been taught to think, we are far from denying that she writes with a vivacity and cleverness which account well enough for the impression she seems to have made upon her contemporaries."—Lon. Quar. Rev., x. 31–41.

"Her Letters present the best views of her character, and form, in truth, her history."—Mrs. Thomson's Recollec. of Lit. Characters, &c., 1854, i. 131; Mrs. Montagu and her Friends.

We promised to say something of Mrs. Montagu's conversational abilities; but our extracts must be brief:

"She was equal to conversation on every subject; but she assumed that dogmatic and presumptuous tone which is well known as peculiar to English learned ladies and even to young English tourists."—Schlosser's Hist. of the Eighteenth Cent., &c., Davidson's trans., 1844, ii. 66.

"She was qualified to preside in her circle, whatever subject was started; but her manner was more dictatorial and sententious than conciliatory or diffident. There was nothing feminine about her; and though her opinions were generally just, yet the organ which conveyed them was not soft nor harmonious. . . . I used to think that these glittering appendages of opulence sometimes helped to dazzle the disputant whom her arguments might not always convince or her literary reputation intimidate. Notwithstanding the defects and weaknesses that I have enumerated, she possessed a masculine understanding, enlightened, cultivated, and expanded by the acquaintance of men as well as of books."—SIR NATHANIEL WRAXALL.

Madame D'Arblay gives a different verdict:

"Her conversational powers were of a truly superior order,—strong, just, clear, and often eloquent. Her process in argument, notwithstanding an earnest solicitude for pre-eminence, was uniformly polite and candid. But her reputation for wit seemed always in her thoughts, marring their natural flow and untutored expression."

"The fortnight spent with our friend Mrs. Montagu, I need not say to you, was passed profitably and pleasantly: as one may say of her, what Johnson said of some one else, 'that she never opens her mouth but to say something.'"—Hannah More's Correspondence, 1784.

And Johnson once said something very flattering of Mrs. Montagu's conversational abilities:

"That lady exerts more mind in conversation than any person I ever met with. Sir, she displays such powers of ratiocination—such radiations of intellectual excellence—as are amazing."

Wilberforce admired her greatly:

"Mrs. Montagu senior," he writes in his Journal in 1789, "has many fine and great and amiable qualities."

"It was not a matter of wonder," says Mrs. Thomson, "that the scholar and the statesman [she speaks generally] delighted in her conversation; for her mind was continually progressing, not only from her own efforts to improve it, but from the insensible collision with superior understandings. . . . Long, long will it be before the 'Blues' can look for such another queen; and could she, and would she, arise, where could she look for such subjects as those who thronged, at the bidding of Mrs. Montagu, to Portman Square?" —Recollections of Lit. Characters, &c., i. 131, 154.

Montagu, Lady Mary Wortley, by birth Lady Mary Pierrepont, 1690?–1762, was the eldest daughter of Evelyn, Earl of Kingston, (afterwards Marquis of Dorchester, finally Duke of Kingston,) by his wife the Lady Mary Fielding, daughter of William, Earl of Denbigh. She became noted at an early age for the extent of her knowledge, the brilliancy of her conversational powers, the quickness of her wit, and the attractions of her person. In August, 1712, against the will of her father, she was married to Edward Wortley Montagu, Esq., grandson of the first Earl of Sandwich. Four years later, Mr. Montagu was appointed ambassador to the Porte, and was absent on his mission until October, 1718, accompanied by his wife, who at this time wrote those sprightly Letters which have conferred upon her name such celebrity. Many of her subsequent Letters, indeed, were also published; but, with the exception of those addressed to Lady Mar between 1720 and '26, it is doubtful if they have added to the writer's reputation. Whilst abroad, Lady Montagu became satisfied of the efficacy of inoculation for the smallpox,—a remedy then universal in the Turkish dominions,—and, in 1717, made the trial on her son, (Edward Wortley Montagu, ante,) then about three years of age. In 1722, her daughter,—afterwards Countess of Bute,—then six years old, was inoculated, and in a short time those of the children of the royal family that had not had the smallpox were subjected to the operation with entire success. The illustrious example was, of course, soon followed; and thus, amidst the protests of the prejudices of the learned and the superstition of the ignorant, a great medical reform was introduced by a woman,—though not without the assistance of Mr. Maitland, who had been attached to the embassy to Turkey in the capacity of physician. From October, 1718, to July, 1739, Lady Montagu was one of the acknowledged chiefs in the English world of fashion and letters,—flattered by the beaux, courted by politicians, and alternately praised and lampooned by the bard of Twickenham, where for some time she fixed her abode. The causes of her quarrel with Pope have been investigated with sufficient care by preceding biographers. To what an extent it was carried may be seen at a glance, by comparing Pope's brutal attack on her ladyship—in his Imitation of the First Satire of the Second Book of Horace (1732)—with the equally reprehensible Reply by which the fair (not gentle) object of his ribaldry suffered her name and pen to be disgraced.

To the surprise of the fashionable world, in 1739, Lady Montagu determined to pass the rest of her days on the Continent, without requiring the attendance of her husband. From this date until about 1758, she resided chiefly at Brescia and at Louvère, on the shores of the lake of Iseo, in the Venetian territory. She then settled at Venice, where she resided until the death of Mr. Montagu, in 1761. After an absence of twenty-two years, she arrived in England in October, and died in the ensuing summer,—August 21, 1762, —in the seventy-third year of her age. As she corresponded with Mr. Montagu until his death, it has been argued that there was no estrangement existing between them; but this is certainly a very charitable construction.

As an author, Lady Montagu deserves notice by her brilliant Letters, already alluded to. Her Works, indeed, contain a number of poetical pieces, (Town Eclogues, &c.,) and some Essays, which, according to a late eminent critic, would hardly have sufficed to immortalize her name:

"Her poetry, though abounding in lively conceptions, is already consigned to that oblivion in which mediocrity is destined, by an irrevocable sentence, to slumber till the end of the world. The Essays are extremely insignificant, and have no other merit, that we can discover, but that they are very few and very short."— Lord Jeffrey: Contrib. to Edin. Rev., 1853, 924; from Edin. Rev., ii. 521, July, 1803.

In 1763 were pub. (surreptitiously) Letters written during her Travels in Europe, Asia, and Africa, to Persons of Distinction, Men of Letters, &c. in Different Parts of Europe, 3 vols. 12mo; additional vol., 1767, 12mo. A "fourth vol. of Lady Mary's Letters," published in the same form in 1767, "appears now to have been a fabrication of [Colonel] Cleland's, as no corresponding MSS. have been found among her ladyship's papers or in the hands of her correspondents."—Lord Jeffrey's Contrib. to Edin. Rev., 1853, 920.

Letters, new eds., 1778, 2 vols. 12mo; 1784, 2 vols. 12mo; Paris, 1799, 8vo, Didot's stereotype ed.,—2 copies on vellum. One was sold at Junot's sale, No. 16, for £4 17*s*. Her Poetical Works (edited by Isaac Reed) were pub. 1768, 12mo. In 1803, appeared her Works, including her Correspondence, Poems, and Essays; pub. from her genuine papers by permission of the Earl of Bute; with Memoirs of her Life, 5 vols. cr. 8vo. Again, 1817, 5 vols. cr. 8vo. Edited by James Dalloway; (see p. 408, ante.) Mr. Dalloway took great liberties with his MSS. Wharncliffe complains of his having omitted several letters and mutilated others. See Preface, p. 2, to Lord Wharncliffe's edition, which appeared in 1837, under the title of The Letters and Works of Lady Mary Wortley Montagu, edited by her great-grandson, Lord Wharncliffe, 5 vols. 8vo. The critic of the Lon. Quar. Review (lviii. 151) does not seem to consider his lordship a much better editor than his humbler predecessor; but this edition is certainly an improvement upon former ones.

In addition to the Letters, we have An Account of the Court of George I.; State of Party at the Succession; Essays, Poems, &c. Prefixed to the first vol. is an excellent resumé of Lady Mary's career, by her grand-daughter, Lady Louisa Stuart, entitled Biographical Anecdotes. In 1838, J. A. St. John pub. Lady Mary's Letters from the Levant, fp. 8vo. Lady Montagu's Letters were received on their first publication with that admiration which has been, but not without qualifications, so generally accorded to them since. A famous writer of the day, not always the most amiable critic in the world, announced them in this flattering style:

"The publication of these letters will be an immortal monument to the memory of Lady Mary Wortley Montagu, and will shew, as long as the English language endures, the sprightliness of her wit, the solidity of her judgment, the elegance of her taste, and the excellence of her real character. These letters are so bewitchingly entertaining that we defy the most phlegmatic man on earth to read one without going through with them, or, after finishing the third volume, not to wish there were twenty more of them."—Dr. Smollett: Critical Review, (notice of the 3 vols.,) 1763.

Lord Jeffrey, in reviewing Mr. Dalloway's edit. of Lady Mary's works, 1803, 5 vols. 8vo, after a notice of her ladyship's earlier letters, (ante,) 1715, remarks,

"The second volume, and a part of the third, are occupied with those charming letters, written during Mr. Wortley's embassy to Constantinople, [1716–18,] upon which the literary reputation of Lady Mary has hitherto been exclusively founded. It would not become us to say any thing of productions which have so long engaged the admiration of the public. The grace and vivacity, the ease and conciseness, of the narrative, and the description which they contain, still remain unrivalled, we think, by any epistolary compositions in our language, and are but slightly shaded by a sprinkling of obsolete tittle-tattle or womanish vanity and affectation. The authenticity of these letters, [i. e. those first pub. in 1763, 3 vols. 12mo, ante,] though at one time disputed, has not lately been called in question; but the secret history of their publication has never, we believe, been laid before the public. The editor of this collection from the original papers gives the following account of it. . . . [Read this account.] The next series of letters consists of those written to her sister the Countess of Mar from 1723 to 1727. These Letters have at least as much vivacity, wit, and sarcasm as any that have been already published, and, though they contain little but the anecdotes and scandal of the time, will long continue to be read and admired for the brilliancy and facility of the composition. Though Lady Mary is excessively entertaining in this correspondence, we cannot say, however, that she is either very amiable or very interesting: there is rather a negation of good affection, we think, throughout, and a certain cold-hearted levity that borders sometimes upon misanthropy and sometimes on indecency. . . . The last series of letters, which extends to the middle of the fifth volume and comes down to the year 1761, consists of those that were addressed by Lady Mary, during her residence abroad, to her daughter the Countess of Bute. These letters, though somewhat less brilliant than those to the Countess of Mar, have more heat and affection in them than any other of her ladyship's productions, and abound in lively and judicious reflections. They indicate at the same time a very great share of vanity and that kind of contempt and indifference for the world into which the veterans of fashion are most apt to shrink."—Contrib. to Edin. Rev., 1853, 919, 920, 922; from Edin. Rev., ii. 512, 513, 517. July, 1803.

"The letters of Lady Mary Wortley Montagu are not unworthy of being named after those of Madame de Sévigné. They have much of the French ease and vivacity, and retain more the character of agreeable epistolary style than perhaps any other letters which have appeared in the English language."—Blair's Lects. on Rhetoric and Belles-Lettres, Lect. XXXVII.

"The Letters of Lady Montagu combine the solid judgment of Rochefoucault, without his misanthropy, and the sentimental elegance of the Marchioness of Sévigné, without her repetition and feebleness."—Dallaway.

"Letters must not be on a subject. Lady Mary Wortley Montagu's Letters on her Journey to Constantinople [1716–17] are an admirable book of travels; but they are not letters."—Sir James Mackintosh: Life, ii. chap. iii.

"They [the Letters of 1716–17] are written with great vivacity and elegance."—Chancellor Kent: Course of Eng. Reading, Oakley's ed., 1853, 65.

"A reader need only glance at Lady Mary's letters to see that she was not less distinguished for wit than prone to indulge in sarcasm, in scandal, and in a very free range of opinions of all sorts. . . . We have no doubt whatsoever that one of the things which drove Lady Mary from England was the enmity she caused all around her by the license of her tongue and pen. She was always writing scandal; a journal full of it was burnt by her family; her very panegyrics were sometimes malicious, or were thought so, in consequence of her character, as in the instance of the extraordinary verses addressed to Mrs. Murray in connexion with a trial for a man's life. Pope himself, with all the temptations of his wit and resentment, would hardly have written of her as he did had her reputation for offence been less a matter of notoriety."—Leigh Hunt: Men, Women, and Books, vol. ii.: Lady Mary Wortley Montagu: Her Life and Writings.

If this be thought a hard saying, let us adduce the evidence of Lady Mary's own grand-daughter, Lady Louisa Stuart, the daughter of Lord and Lady Bute. Speaking of her mother, Lady Bute, she remarks,

"Though she always spoke of Lady Mary with great respect, yet it might be perceived that she knew it had been too much her custom to note down and enlarge upon all the scandalous rumours of the day, without weighing their truth or even their probability; to record as certain facts stories that perhaps sprang up like mushrooms from the dirt and had as brief an existence, but tended to defame persons of the most spotless character."—Biographical Anecdotes prefixed to Lord Wharncliffe's ed. of Lady Mary's Works, 1837, i. 21, 22, 23.

"A more pleasing and delicate style marks her correspondence in later years, especially when addressing her daughter, [Lady Bute,] the only individual for whom she seems to have felt uninterrupted affection. In her letters from the banks of the Lake Isco, a spirit of philosophy and an air of tranquillity appear throughout that place her in a far more amiable light in her retirement as the recluse of Louvère than when shining the wit and the bel esprit of the court of the English monarch."—Ladies of England, 1843, i. 1–37.

"We cannot but suspect that every reperusal of Lady Mary's 'Letters' will tend to a doubt whether her merit has not been somewhat exaggerated. When they first appeared, a traveller and an author of Lady Mary's rank and sex was a double wonder,—which was much increased by Lady Mary's personal circumstances and by the vivacity, spirit, and boldness of her pen. But, now that the extraneous sources of admiration have run dry, we confess that the intrinsic value of the letters seems less striking, and that if we were to deduct from Lady Mary's pleasantry and wit those passages which a respectable woman ought not, perhaps, to have written, we should very considerably reduce her claims to literary eminence."—Lon. Quar. Rev., lviii. 147–196: Review of Lord Wharncliffe's ed., q. v.

We have referred to Lady Montagu's elevated rank as a leader of fashion. She valued this position at least as much as her literary reputation, and took care to make each conducive to the interests of the other. Pope could write, doubtless with a good conscience, before their quarrel,

"Joy lives not here: to happier seats it flies,
And only dwells where Wortley casts her eyes."

But there was one less obtrusive worshipper at her shrine whom she preferred even to Pope.

"The brilliant Mary Montagu said that she had known all the wits, and that Addison was the best company in the world."—Lord Macaulay's Essays, Crit. and Histor., 1854, iii. 394.

"And so farewell, poor, flourishing, disappointed, reconciled, wise, foolish, enchanting Lady Mary! Fair English vision in Turkland; Turkish vision in ours; the female wit of the days of Pope; benefactress of the species: irritating satirist of the circles. Thou didst err for want of a little more heart,—perhaps for want of finding enough in others, or for loss of thy mother in infancy: but thy loss was our gain: for it gained us thy books and thy inoculation. . . . Lovable indeed thou wert not, whatever thou mightst have been rendered; but admirable thou wert, and ever wilt thou be thought so, as long as pen writeth straightforward and sense or Sultana hath a charm."—Leigh Hunt: Men, Women, and Books.

We certainly would not advise our young women to imitate all of Lady Mary's ways and modes of thinking, nor to copy carefully after all of her highly-seasoned epistles; but there are points in which she might be followed with advantage. It must be allowed, according to a late eminent critic, that although "a little spoiled by flattery, and not altogether 'undebauched by the world,' she seems to have possessed a masculine solidity of understanding, great liveliness of fancy, and such powers of observation and discrimination of character as to give her opinions great authority on all the ordinary subjects of practical manners and conduct."—Lord Jeffrey: Contrib. to Edin. Rev., 1853, 924.

One more hint to our female readers, and we have done:

"Her learning never caused Lady Mary to contemn the pursuits more especially allotted to her sex: on the contrary, we find her saying, in one of her late letters, while treating of her grand daughter's [Lady Louisa Stuart] education, 'I think it as scandalous for a woman not to know how to use a needle as for a man not to know how to use a sword.'"—[Letter to the Countess of Bute, Jan. 28th, 1753:] Lord Mahon's Hist. of Eng., 3d ed., 1854, viii. 326.

Montgomery, J. L. See TENNENT, H. L.

Montgomery, James, Nov. 4, 1771–April 30, 1854, the son of a Moravian missionary, and a native of Irvine, Ayrshire, Scotland, after acquiring a good education at the Moravian institution at Fulneck, accepted in 1792 the post of assistant in the office of the Sheffield Register. Mr. Gales, the publisher, having used his pen on political subjects with more freedom than pleased the Government officers, and being obliged to leave suddenly for America to escape prosecution, his youthful colleague succeeded to his editorial honours and his legal persecutions. The name of the sheet he thought proper to change to that of The Sheffield Iris. In 1795 he was sentenced to three months' imprisonment, and £20 fine, for publishing an alleged seditious libel, (the indictment was founded on a gross misrepresentation;) and in 1796 he was again imprisoned for six months, and fined £30, for printing an offensive account of the conduct of a magistrate who had been engaged in quelling a Sheffield riot in the preceding year. After an editorial career of more than thirty years, Mr. Montgomery, in 1825, closed his connexion with the Iris. In 1835 he was complimented by the offer of Professorship of Rhetoric in the University of Edinburgh, but he had the good sense to refuse to accept a post which he was not likely to fill with advantage. The latter part of his life was usefully occupied in benevolent enterprises in Sheffield, where he lived comfortably on the profits which had accrued from the sale of his books, to which was added (in 1835) a pension of £150 and—far more highly prized—the esteem and affection of a large circle of friends, who honoured him for his substantial worth whilst living, and lamented his death as a loss to the community. He received the unusual honour of a public funeral, and his fellow-citizens immediately took measures to purchase the house in which he was born and preserve it as a monument to his memory. We do not know whether this project was carried out or not.

Montgomery first made his approaches to the public by the usual channel,—fugitive contributions to periodical literature. "Feel your way before you with the public, as Montgomery did," writes Robert Southey to Ebenezer Elliott, in 1808:

"He sent his verses to the newspapers, and when they were copied from one to another it was a sure sign they had succeeded. He then communicated them, as they were copied from the papers, to the Poetical Register; the Review selected them for praise; and then, when he published them in a collected form, he did nothing more than claim in his own character the praise which had been bestowed upon him under a fictitious name."—Southey's Life and Corresp., vol. xiv.

It is worthy of notice, in connexion with the above, that Montgomery was one of the earliest and most steadfast literary patrons of his fellow-townsman, Ebenezer Elliott. The Sheffield Iris had much to do with the poetical reputation of the latter. See Montgomery's glowing eulogy on his friend's poetry, ELLIOTT, EBENEZER, p. 552, ante. Montgomery soon acquired sufficient confidence from the favourable manner in which his humble offerings were received to venture upon more ambitious authorship. His publications appeared in the following order:

1. Prison Amusements, 1797. This vol. is composed of Poems written during his incarceration in York Castle. 2. The Ocean; a Poem, 1805. 3. The Wanderer of Switzerland, and other Poems, 1806, 12mo;. 3d ed. in the same year, 12mo, pp. 175.

"We took compassion upon Mr. Montgomery on his first appearance; conceiving him to be some slender youth of seventeen intoxicated with weak tea and the praises of sentimental ensigns and other provincial literati, and tempted, in that situation, to commit a feeble outrage on the public, of which the recollection would be a sufficient punishment. A third edition, however, is too alarming to be passed over in silence; and, though we are perfectly persuaded that in less than three years nobody will know the name of the Wanderer of Switzerland or any of the other poems in this collection, still we think ourselves called on to interfere, to prevent, as far as in us lies, the mischief that may arise from the intermediate prevalence of so distressing an epidemic. It is hard to say what numbers of ingenious youth may be led to expose themselves in public by the success of this performance, or what addition may be made in a few months to that great sinking-fund of bad taste which is daily wearing down the debt which we have so long owed to the classical writers of antiquity. . . . When every day is bringing forth some new work from the pen of Scott, Campbell, Rogers, Baillie, Sotheby, Wordsworth, or Southey, it is natural to feel some disgust at the undistinguishing voracity which can swallow down three editions of songs to convivial societies and verses to a pillow."—Edin. Rev., ix. 347–355, Jan 1807.

Thus spake Lord Jeffrey, then and long afterwards the great ogre who devoured a score of newly-fledged authors with as little compunction as he ate his dinner. In this case, as in many other instances, he proved neither "a prophet nor the son of a prophet." So far from the Wanderer in Switzerland permitting himself to be quietly inurned within three years from the time of this fatal wound,—as the assailant fondly thought,—he has continued to give unmistakable evidence of undiminished vigour, still retains his vitality, and is at this moment "wandering" through the world, a favoured guest at every fireside, and the companion alike of childhood and old age, of the youthful enthusiast who believes all things for which he hopes, to the incredulous and misanthropic worldling who credits nothing which he is not able to prove.

"Bryant," says Tuckerman, "when a boy knew Montgomery's Wanderer in Switzerland by heart."

Many years later, this youthful admirer—then himself richly laden with the coveted rewards of successful authorship—had the pleasure of a personal conference with one whose works had so large a share in the formation of his poetical taste. This interview occurred in June, 1853, at Montgomery's residence,—"The Mount," Sheffield,—only ten months before the sweet singer of The Songs of Sion was advanced to a higher choir and permitted to essay a richer harmony in the courts of heaven. Lord Jeffrey's savage attack upon the modest Wanderer was not allowed to pass unrebuked. Among those who came to the rescue were Robert Southey, who despised any thing which savoured of Whiggism, and John Wilson, whose formidable cudgel was always forward in defence of the persecuted.

"There stands upon record," says Southey, "only one piece of formal criticism as mischievous as this: and that is the criticism upon Kirke White in a monthly journal, of which the notorious folly and injustice have been reprobated by the thousands who regret and admire that extraordinary and excellent youth. . . . The prediction concerning Mr. Montgomery, like most of the predictions which have issued from the same oracle, has proved false Twice three years have elapsed; the poems are still heard of, still read, and admired, and purchased, and re-edited; and, what must be still more alarming to the careful guardian of the public taste, a second volume [The West Indies, and other Poems] has been published. . . . Never did any volume more truly deserve the reception which it found. Faults there were in it; for where is the volume without them? The longest of the poems [The Wanderer of Switzerland] is an experiment, treating an heroic subject in lyric measure and upon a dramatic plan. . . . Notwithstanding the inherent and irremediable defect of the poem, no person capable of appreciating poetry could read it without perceiving that it was the production of a rich and powerful mind."—Lon. Quar. Rev., vi. 405–419.

"It was said by the Edinburgh Review," remarks Wilson, "that none but maudlin milliners and sentimental ensigns supposed that James Montgomery was a poet. Then is Maga a maudlin milliner, and Christopher North a sentimental ensign."—Blackw. Mag., xxx. 476, Sept. 1831: An Hour's Talk about Poetry.

It is pleasing to be able to add that the formidable Edinburgh itself was magnanimous enough to admit that the knife had been used rather too freely:

"It is now about twenty-eight years since we noticed in this Journal"—we copy from No. 124, July, 1835—"Mr. Montgomery's Wanderer of Switzerland; and, looking back to what we then wrote, we fairly confess that, were the task now to be performed for the first time, our criticism would probably be characterized by a milder spirit."—p. 473.

The judgment is reaffirmed, indeed, but the predictions of literary failure are acknowledged to have been ventured without due consideration. It is to be observed, however, that this last article was not written by the original offender, Lord Jeffrey.

"His Wanderer of Switzerland," remarks Christopher North, on another occasion, "is certainly the least successful of all Mr. Montgomery's more ambitious poems. The plan of it is without originality or felicity of any kind; and the versification, though easy and flowing, is very monotonous,—very much in the style of the see-saw school. We cannot sincerely say that it contains any very fine passages; and had Mr. Montgomery written nothing else his name would have had but a faint sound to our ears."—Blackw. Mag., xxii. 99, Oct. 1827: Montgomery's Pelican Island, &c.

"The 'Wanderer of Switzerland,'" says a judicious critic, "could scarcely have attained its popularity either from its subject, which is local, or its treatment, which verges on commonplace, or from its poetical merits, which are not of the rarest; but along with it some fine lyrics were published, high-toned in sentiment and feeling, which bespoke the true touch and found an echo in many hearts."—Moir's Poet. Lit. of the Past Half-Century, 1851, 152.

Some of the critics of the day are less guarded in their commendation.

"We have no doubt that his genius may become an ornament to his profession."—Lit. Jour.

"Mr. Montgomery displays a rich and romantic fancy, a tender heart, a copious and active command of imagery and language, and an irresistible influence over the feelings."—Eclec. Rev.

For a very high character of this volume, see Ann. Rev., 1805.

"The general merit of these poems is far from inconsiderable, most of them being characterized by a graceful ease of versification and by the ample expression of genuine feeling."—Lon. Month. Rev.

"We reluctantly quit our examination of this collection of poems, whose genuine and unaffected beauties are scattered throughout with no sparing hand. Amidst the mass of modern poetry, published or unpublished, we have seen few compositions worthy of more careful perusal or more lasting fame."—Crit. Rev.

The publication of The Wanderer in Switzerland was the means of the author's engagement with the Eclectic Review.

4. The West Indies, and other Poems, 1810, 12mo, pp. 160. The first piece in this volume—The West Indies—originally appeared in Bowyer's splendid volume on the Abolition of the Slave-Trade, and,

"like almost all poems written per order, is, on the whole, but a moderate performance. Its subject, strictly speaking, is the slave-trade. It has, however, some fine passages. . . . There is much strong writing in the other books; but they are often rather rhetorical than poetical, sometimes declamatory, and not seldom, though noisy, dull. Indignation alone will not make noble verses; and the poet's indignation degenerates into abuse. He 'did well to be angry;' but his lightnings are not always electrical, and he gives us claps of imitative thunder."—Prof. Wilson: Blackw. Mag., xxxiv. 512, 514, Oct. 1833.

"His indignation is not always dignified: his muse sometimes is a scold, and he trusts too much, in exciting pity and terror, to the clank of chains. Still, it is by far the best poem we ever saw on the subject: there are strokes of power and touches of pathos in every other page; the episodical passages are very beautiful."—Ibid.: Blackw. Mag., xxii. 499, Oct. 1827.

"The plan is necessarily defective: there is neither unity in the design nor cohesion in the parts, which follow each other without any natural or obvious connection. But with what strength the poem is written the following picture will evince: [quotation commencing

"Man, we shall meet again beyond the tomb."]"

Robert Southey: Lon. Quar. Rev., vi. 414, Dec. 1811.

"There are great charms of verse displayed in the poem of The West Indies. One would scarcely have believed the subject of the slave-trade capable of them. . . . The portraiture of the Creole [quoted by Southey, supra] is a masterpiece."—Howitt's Homes and Haunts of the Most Eminent British Poets, vol. ii.: Montgomery.

"A new controversial pamphlet in verse on this exhausted subject, containing all the old commonplaces of bleeding negroes and bloodthirsty planters, clanking chains and echoing whip,—even though embodied in vigorous and harmonious versification and relieved by sketches of natural scenery of singular freshness and beauty,—was but ill calculated to afford pleasure to the lovers of genuine poetry. . . . Few, we suppose, have read the poem twice through, though many may often have turned back to such passages as those which describe the charm with which love of country invests alike the bleakest as well as the richest shore:

Edin. Rev., lxi. 474, July, 1835.

"Somewhat loosely put together as it here and there is, it sparkles throughout with gems of thought, which are appropriately and beautifully set, yet lose little of their lustre when removed from their places, and shine by their own intrinsic light. It is a poem, however, rather of the feelings than of the fancy, and has too much to do with stern facts to be thoroughly delightful."—Moir's Sketches of the Poet. Lit., &c., i. 162.

5. The World before the Flood; a Poem in Ten Cantos with other Occasional Pieces, 1812, pp. 304.

"Montgomery's poem came in the same parcel with your letter I had previously written about it to the Quarterly, and was told, in reply, that it was wished to pass it by there, because it had disappointed everybody. I wish I could say that I myself did not in some degree feel disappointed also; yet there is so much that is really beautiful and which I can sincerely praise, and the outline of the story will read so well with the choicest passages interspersed, that I shall send up a review, and do—as a Frenchman would say—my possible."—Robert Southey to Mr. Neville White, June 14, 1813: Southey's Life and Corresp., chap. xviii.

Accordingly, Southey reviewed the poem in the Quarterly for April, 1814; and to that review we refer the reader:

"The least successful portions of the work before us," remarks the critic, "are the second interview between Javan and Zillah, and the scene between them before the giant-king. . . . Having noticed what appears to us the feebiest part of the poem, it is equally our duty to instance what we think the best: it is the fourth canto, in which Enoch relates to Javan the death of Adam."—p. 55.

"'The World before the Flood' teems with the finest poetry but, although we have much to say about it, both of praise and censure, we must refrain; for, if not, what is to become of the 'Pelican Island'?"—John Wilson: Blackw. Mag., xxii. 501: Montgomery's Pelican Island, &c.

"We certainly think that Mr. Montgomery essayed a task of needless difficulty in carrying his scene so far back into primeval antiquity and resting the main interest of his poem on an imaginary contest between the descendants of Cain and Seth, the catastrophe of which is the real assumption of Enoch. Still, the difficulty, though great, has not been unsuccessfully surmounted. Though the interest which his imaginary personages excite is not intense, and the movement of his story has little that produces suspense or curiosity, the characters are natural, the pictures of life and human feeling with which it abounds touching and solemn; and such passages as those which describe the first view of his native valley which opens to the repentant and returning Javan, the interview with her whom he had forsaken but could not forget, the death of Adam, the effect of Jubal's music on the distracted Cain, might have been claimed, without injury to their fame, by the most distinguished among our poets."—Edin. Rev., lxi. 475, July, 1835.

8. Greenland, and other Poems, 1819, 8vo, pp. 250.

"In 'Greenland' Mr. Montgomery appears for the first time to have found a theme at once calculated to be popular from the richness and variety of the poetical development of which it was susceptible and from being perfectly in unison with his own strongly-devotional cast of mind. . . . The descriptions are animated by the same spirit of reality and truth which dictated the idea of the poem. The vagueness which pervades the sketches of scenery in 'The Wanderer of Switzerland' has vanished. Every line is expressive, every feature is clear and sharply defined as the objects themselves against the winter sky. How graphic is this description of a frost-fog at sea during the voyage of the missionaries! [quotation commencing with "The sun retires,"

and concluding with the line,

"Its turrets heighten and its piers expand."]

"We could accumulate many of these splendid winter-pieces did our limits permit."—Edin. Rev., lxi. 477.

"The subject being quite congenial to the taste, feelings, and genius of the author is written con amore, and the composition is pervaded by a noble but subdued enthusiasm."—Moir's Sketches of the Poet. Lit., &c., i. 53.

"His bursts of sacred poetry, compared with his Greenland, remind us of a person singing enchantingly by ear but becoming languid and powerless the moment he sits down to a note-book."—Rev. John Keble: Lon. Quar. Rev., xxxii. 217.

12. The Pelican Island, and other Poems, 1827, 12mo.

"The best of all Mr. Montgomery's poems: in idea the most original, in execution the most powerful, although in both very imperfect. . . . With nothing were we so much surprised and charmed as with the versification. We do not remember having previously read any of Mr. Montgomery's blank verse; and to write blank verse well is one of the most difficult of all human achievements."—Prof. Wilson: Blackw. Mag., xxii. 491–511, Oct. 1827 Montgomery's Pelican Island. &c.

'In earnestness and fervour that poem is by few or none excelled: it is embalmed in sincerity, and therefore shall fade not away; neither shall it moulder, not even although exposed to the air, and blow the air ever so rudely through time's mutations."—Ibid.: Blackw. Mag., xxx. 476, Sept. 1831: An Hour's Talk about Poetry.

"Essaying a still loftier flight, the whole of his imaginative strength was garnered up to be put forth in 'The Pelican Island:' nor was his attempt like that of Icarus. It must be placed at the head of his works, whether we regard it as a whole or in insulated passages; for it exhibits a richer command of language, and its imagery is collected from a much more extended field of thought and research, than any of its predecessors."—Moir's Sketch of the Poet. Lit., &c., 154.

"There is less human interest in this poem; but it is perhaps the most philosophical of his writings, and gives great scope to his imaginative and descriptive powers."—Howitt's Homes and Haunts, &c.

"It has all the distinguishing qualities of its predecessors,—sincerity of feeling, great beauty of poetical expression, and a power of lending novelty even to reflections and images with which we are most familiar. He never shrinks from the plainest and most familiar illustration where it seems to be simplest and most forcible for his purpose; and the effect is almost always good. . . . It is, indeed, the perfectly natural and unaffected manner in which Mr. Montgomery's mind turns every thing around him into food for high and holy thoughts—connecting the simplest flower, the slightest incident, with the ideas of infinity and eternity—that imparts, perhaps, their greatest charm to these lyrics."—*Edin. "We think the publication of these letters a most happy idea."—Lon. Metropolitan.

Editions of his Poetical Works were pub. in 1818, 3 vols. 12mo; 1826, 4 vols. 12mo; 1828, 4 vols. 12mo; 1825, 3 vols.; 1841, 4 vols. fp. 8vo; 1850, sq.; 1851, sq.; 1854, 8vo; 1855, 4 vols. fp. 8vo. Since Mr. Montgomery's decease, John Holland and James Everett have given to the world Memoirs of the Life and Writings of James Montgomery: including Selections from his Correspondence, Remains in Prose and Verse, and Conversations, 7 vols. fp. 8vo, £3 13*s.* 6*d.*: vols. i.–iv., 1855; v.–vii., 1856. Notices of vols. i., ii. will be found in the British Quarterly Rev. (copied in the Bost. Liv. Age, xlv. 370) and in the London Times, (copied in the Bost. Liv. Age, xlvii. 282.) See also Lon. Athenæum, 1855, 105, 1268, for any thing but complimentary reviews of vols. i.–iv. The Athenæum for Feb. 6, 1858, in a notice of J. W. King's Memoir of Montgomery, styles Holland and Everett's work "that heavy affliction, the voluminous—and not luminous—attempt at the biography of James Montgomery by a couple of insufficient, dull, and pretentious authors."—ii. 177.

An abridgment of, or rather a series of selections from, these Memoirs, with original additions by Mrs. Helen C. Knight, authoress of Lady Huntington and her Friends, Memoir of Hannah More, &c., was pub. in Boston, 1857, 12mo, pp. 416.

"Of the thousands who weekly chant his hymns, there are many who will be glad to know the facts of his career. These have been brought together with tact and taste by Mrs. Knight; and the volume is neatly published and very pleasing. To the religious world, the lovers of household poetry, and the admirers of a pure and noble character, it will prove a treat."—H. T. Tuckerman.

"Mrs. Knight has made a most valuable addition to our biographical literature, and has brought to our familiar knowledge a character which embodies as much of the 'beauty of holiness' as it is ever given to any one mortal to attain and exhibit."—A. P. Peabody, D.D.: N. Amer. Rev., Oct. 1857, 563.

J. W. King's Memoir, Political and Poetical, of Montgomery was pub. in 1858, and receives but very faint commendation from the London Athenæum in the notice just referred to. Mr. King, it may be remembered, is the author of the Life of Gavazzi, &c.

Among the best-known of Montgomery's minor productions are The Common Lot, The Little Cloud, Night, Prayer, Robert Burns, Moonlight in York Castle, The Daisy in India, Friends, A Voyage Round the World, Friend after Friend Departs, Humility, The Grave, Questions and Answers, The Field of the World, Aspirations of Youth, Home, Incognita, Bolehill Trees, Make Way for Liberty, The Alps, A Walk in Spring.

"With the exception perhaps of Moore, Campbell, and Hemans, I doubt if an equal number of the lyrics of any other modern poet have so completely found their way to the national heart, there to be enshrined in hallowed remembrance. One great merit which may be claimed for James Montgomery is that he has encroached on no man's property as a poet: he has staked off a portion of the great common of literature for himself and cultivated it according to his own taste and fancy."—Moir's Sketches of the Poet. Lit., &c., 155. 156.

This, it will be remembered, is the claim which the poet himself preferred at the public entertainment given in his honour at Sheffield in 1825, when he retired from the editorial chair of the Sheffield Iris.

To James Montgomery, indeed, must ever be decreed the highest praise which either poet or prose-writer can deserve,—that of a steadfast, consistent, earnest, yet temperate advocacy of whatsoever is true, "just, pure, lovely, or of good report."

"Those who can distinguish the fine gold from the sounding brass of poetry must place his name high in the list of the British poets; and those who consider that the chiefest duty of such is to promote the cause of religion, virtue, and humanity must acknowledge in him one of their most zealous and efficient advocates."—Mrs. S. C. Hall.

"Delicacy, tenderness, and a sacred feeling of the highest order mark the effusions of Montgomery's highly-cultivated muse."—Dibdin's Lib. Comp., 755.

"He is essentially a religious poet. It is what of all things upon earth we can well believe he would most desire to be; and that he is in the truest sense of the word. In all his poems, the spirit of a piety profound and beautifully benevolent is instantly felt. Perhaps there are no lyrics in the language which are so truly Christian,—that is, which breathe the same glowing love to God and man, without one tinge of the bigotry that too commonly eats into zeal as rust into the finest steel. . . . The longer his fame endures, and the wider it spreads, the better it will be for virtue and for man."—Howitt's Homes and Haunts, &c.

"His poetry will live; for he has heart and imagination profound. . . . Mr. Montgomery cannot write any thing, however slight, that is not pregnant with piety. Commonplace truths are so presented in the following singular little poem [Questions and Answers] as to strike the heart like a knell. This is the triumph of genius. . . . James Montgomery, of all the poets of this age, is in his poetry—and we believe, also out of it—the most religious man. All his thoughts, sentiments, and feelings are moulded and coloured by religion. . . . A spirit of invocation, prayer, and praise pervades all his poetry; and it is as sincere as it is beautiful. The elements of air, earth, fire, and water are to him all sanctified, not by poetry alone, but by piety. . . . To poetry he resorts in his most pious moods, when his heart overflows with gratitude to God and with love to man. His inspiration is alike holy in the sanctuary built with hands, the chapel of his brethren, and in the temple not built with hands, eternal in the heavens, whose mighty roof overhangs all the children of men."—Prof. Wilson: Blackw. Mag., xviii. 759, xix. 89, xxvii. 147.

Montgomery, Sir Robert. A Discourse concerning the Designed Establishment of a New Colony to the South of Carolina, in the most delightful country of the Universe, Lon., 1717, 8vo, pp. 30. With large folding plate, representing the form of settling the Districts, or Country Divisions, in the Margravate of Azilia, (the name of the settlement.) Sir Robert obtained a grant of all the land between the rivers Altamaha and Savannah, Georgia. See A Description of the Golden Islands, 1720, 8vo; Rich's Bibl. Amer. Nova, i. 27.

Montgomery, Robert, 1807–1856, a native of Bath, England, was the son of a Mr. Gomery, a famous theatrical clown: whether the father shortened his proper patronymic by dropping a syllable, or the son—as has been alleged—elongated Gomery without family precedent, is still a matter of uncertainty. In 1830, the subject of our notice entered himself of Lincoln College, Oxford; graduated B.A. in 1833, and M.A. in '38; was ordained in the Church of England in 1835; Curate of Whittington until May, 1836; subsequently minister of Percy Street Chapel, London, to the beginning of 1838, when he removed to St. Jude's Episcopal Chapel, Glasgow, where he continued until December, 1842; resumed his ministry at Percy Street Chapel, Oct. 1843, and retained this charge until his death. Mr. Montgomery was a most voluminous author, both in poetry and prose. 1. The Age Reviewed: a Satire, in two Parts, 1827, 8vo. Anon. This poem is illustrated with Notes. It is not included in the author's collected works, although we find there a still earlier poem, The Stage-Coach, written in 1827. 2. The Omnipresence of the Deity, 1828, 8vo; 8 eds. in 8 months; 28th ed., 1855, 8vo. Reprinted in Germany. Maunders's school ed., 1845, 18mo. This poem, mostly written when the author was nineteen years of age, was commended on its publication by Southey, Bowles, Crabbe, Sharon Turner, and other eminent literary authorities. A critic in the Lon. Times thus eulogized it:

"He has displayed a depth of thought which would do honour to any writer of the present day. A glowing spirit of devotion distinguishes the whole work. In every page we find 'thoughts that breathe and words that burn.' A purer body of ethics we have never read; and he who can peruse it without emotion, clothed as it is in the graceful garb of poetry, must have a very cold and insensible heart."

An extended review by Professor Wilson, in which much censure is qualified by little praise, will be found in Blackw. Mag., xxiii. 751–771, (see also Wilson's An Hour's Talk about Poetry, and his remarks on Sacred Poetry; also his paper on Canting Poetry, in Blackw. Mag., xxvi. 241.) But the most terrible castigation which Mr. Montgomery's verses provoked was performed in the sight of the readers of the 101st Edinburgh Review, for April, 1830, by one accustomed to the unsparing and unpitying use of the lash,—Mr. T. B. (now Lord) Macaulay. It will also be found in his lordship's Critical and Historical Essays, 1854, i. 256–278. A notice of the 2d ed. of Montgomery's poem of Satan occupies the last two pages. The edition of The Omnipresence of the Deity, then before the relentless critic, was the eleventh, (dated 1830;) and we doubt not that many readers of this philippic thought that it would be the last. But we have seen that this poem has by this time (Feb. 1858) reached the 28th edition, and six of the last edits. have been pub. within the last ten years. People will buy what pleases them, critics to the contrary notwithstanding. We quote a few sentences from his lordship's strictures. After quoting a fable of Pilpay's, the reviewer remarks,

"The writer evidently means to caution us against the practice of puffers,—a class of people who have more than once talked the public into the most absurd errors, but who surely never played a more curious or a more difficult trick than when they passed Mr. Robert Montgomery off upon the world as a great poet. . . . We have no enmity to Mr. Robert Montgomery. We know nothing whatever about him, except what we have learned from his books, and from the portrait prefixed to one of them, in which he appears to be doing his very best to look like a man of genius and sensibility, though with less success than his strenuous exertions deserve. We select him because his works have received more enthusiastic praise, and have deserved more unmixed contempt, than any which, as far as our knowledge extends, have appeared within the last three or four years. . . . The circulation of this writer's poetry has been greater than that of Southey's Roderick, and beyond all comparison greater than that of Cary's Dante or of the best works of Coleridge. . . . It might be of use to plagiarists to know, as a general rule, that what they steal is—to employ a phrase common in advertisements—of no use to any but the right owner. We never fell in, however, with any plunderer who so little understood how to turn his booty to good account as Mr. Montgomery. . . . We would not be understood, however, to say Mr. Robert Montgomery cannot make similitudes for himself. A very few lines further on, we find one which has every mark of originality, and on which, we will be bound, none of the poets whom he has plundered will ever think of making reprisals:

As streams meander level with their fount.'

"We take this to be, on the whole, the worst similitude in the world. In the first place, no stream meanders, or can possibly meander, level with its fount. In the next place, if streams did meander level with their founts, no two motions can be less like each other than that of meandering level and that of mounting upwards."—Essays, i. 257, 265, 266, 267, 269, 276.

The reviewer then dismisses the unhappy victim with this parting compliment:

"Here we conclude. If our remarks give pain to Mr. Robert Montgomery, we are sorry for it. But, at whatever cost of pain to individuals, literature must be purified from this taint; and, to show that we are not actuated by any feelings of personal enmity towards him, we hereby give notice that, as soon as any book shall by means of puffing reach a second edition, our intention is to do unto the writer of it as we have done unto Mr. Robert Montgomery."

This review, as we have already remarked, was originally pub. in April, 1830. Early in the same year, Mr. Edward Clarkson, author of Lectures on the Pyramids, &c., prepared a pamphlet of 164 pp., entitled Robert Montgomery and his Reviewers, with some Remarks on the Present State of English Poetry and on the Laws of Criticism. In this treatise Mr. Montgomery is valiantly defended against the strictures of Fraser's Magazine and the Edinburgh Literary Journal. Clarkson, who was not, even in 1830, acquainted with Montgomery, had previously reviewed some of his early productions favourably in the British Traveller and the Sunday Times. Fortunately (shall we say?) for the Edinburgh Reviewer, Clarkson's pamphlet was in press when the critique of the latter first made its appearance. Mr. Macaulay has since become a great man; but where would he have been had he fallen into the hands of the redoubtable Clarkson? However, we have no right to make light of Mr. C.'s pamphlet; for we have never seen it, and it may be a most sensible production. It is somewhat curious that in the month succeeding the appearance of Mr. Macaulay's critique Mr. Robert Southey writes to Mr. Montgomery, in acknowledging the receipt of a present of some (we know not which) of his poems:

"Any single page of these volumes contains sufficient proof of the ardour and power with which any thing may be done when they are disciplined."—May 11, 1830.

Yet six years later (Sept. 1836) Southey regretted, in a conversation with Dr. R. Shelton Mackenzie, that "Montgomery should have been as much overpraised at first as he was latterly abused." See Southey's Life and Corresp., chaps. xxxiii., xxxvi.

We continue the enumeration of Mr. Montgomery's publications. 3. A Universal Prayer; Death; A Vision of Heaven; A Vision of Hell, 1828, 4to; 4th ed., 1829, p. 8vo; last ed., 1846, 12mo. 4. The Puffiad: a Satire, 1830. 5. Satan, or Intellect without God; a Poem, 1830, p. 8vo; 2d ed., 1830; 10th ed., 1842, 12mo. Unmercifully ridiculed by Mr. Macaulay, (ubi supra,) and by Professor Wilson, (Noctes Ambros., No. XLVIII., April, 1830,) and highly commended by Sir Archibald Alison, (Hist. of Europe, 1789–1815, vol. ix. 284,) and by the London Evangelical Magazine, (Feb. 1830, 62.) A burlesque—Satan Reformer; by Montgomery the Third—will be found in Blackw. Mag., xxxi. 592, April, 1832. 6. Oxford; a Poem, 1831, 12mo, pp. 258. With eleven views by J. Skelton, and Illustrative Notes; 3d ed., 1843, 12mo.

"So so! the puffers of Mr. Montgomery's poetry, the heralds of his fame, the idolaters of his divine genius, are beginning to blush for their folly. They really have paused upon this volume."—Lon. Month. Rev., May, 1831, 31–48, q. v.
